Congressional Record.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 25, 1919.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, October 22, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania withhold the call for a quorum for a moment?

Mr. SPENCER. I ask the Senator to withhold the call for a few moments.

Mr. PENROSE. Would not the Senator from Colorado rather have a quorum present?

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has the floor, and I merely wish to offer a resolution. I will say to the Senator that I shall not occupy any time.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. MYERS. As in legislative session, I ask leave to submit a resolution and have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 220) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is authoritatively reported that so-called bandits have kidnaped and carried into captivity William O. Jenkins, American consular agent at Puebla, Mexico, and are holding him for a ransom of $150,000: Therefore be it

Resolved by the United States Senate, That it is the sense of this body that the President of the United States and the Secretary of War should at once use all the armed forces and power of the United States to recover and have immediately the said Jenkins alive or his abductors dead.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. TMOMAS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

THREATENED COAL STRIKE.

Mr. THOMAS. I introduce and ask to have read at length a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) assuring the national administration of the unqualified support of the Congress in dealing with the impending strike of coal miners in the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the officers of the United Mine Workers of America have ordered all miners in the bituminous coal mines of the United States to strike on Saturday, the first day of November next, notwithstanding efforts of the Secretary of Labor to secure some basis of negotiation suspending or preventing same; and

Whereas the representatives of said organization have arbitrarily rejected the President's earnest council for compromise; and

Whereas strikes in other fields of industry heretofore ordered and still unsettled threaten to continue indefinitely; and

Whereas demands for increased wages and shorter hours accompanied by expressed or implied determination to enforce such demands if necessary by strikes in other fields of industry have been and are being made; and

Whereas the threatened strike of the bituminous coal miners will, if carried into effect, interfere with, injure, or suspend nearly all the national pursuits and industries, inflict continued and incredible hardship and suffering upon all the people of the United States and provoke disorder, violence, bloodshed, and insurrection throughout the land; and

Whereas the enforcement of the law and the maintenance of order for the security of life and property and the protection of the individual citizen in the exercise of his constitutional rights is the first and paramount duty of the Government and must be at all times vigorously and effectively safeguarded by the use of every means essential to that end: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That we hereby give the national administration and all others in authority the assurance of our constant, continuous, and unqualified support in the great emergency confronting us, and call upon them to vindicate the majesty and power of the Government in enforcing obedience to and respect for the Constitution and the laws and in fully protecting every citizen in the maintenance and exercise of his lawful rights and the observance of his lawful obligations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Monday next, after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall call up the joint resolution just offered and ask for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. MYERS. I merely desire to say that as objection was made to the consideration of the resolution I offered, I ask that it may go over until the next legislative day, and at that time I shall call it up and have some remarks to make upon it, and I shall also ask for action upon it.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the objection I made to it.

Mr. MYERS. Then I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator take some time in explaining the resolution, because it is very broad in its scope.

Mr. MYERS. I think it explains itself.

Mr. SMOOT. There are so very few Senators here now that I think it is the part of wisdom not only for the Senator but for all to have it go over until the next day, and then the Senator can take time to explain the resolution.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will withdraw the request at this time, but I shall call it up later in the day or on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

SACCHARIN IN FOOD.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, a few days ago I submitted a resolution concerning the use of saccharin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. A subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has been considering the question. I notice in the RECORD that yesterday the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] introduced some correspondence from the Department of Agriculture in regard to the matter.

During the administration of President Roosevelt he appointed a committee of experts to investigate and pass upon the healthfulness of certain ingredients of food, and among these was saccharin. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD the supplemental report of the Referee Board of Scientific Experts upon the subject of saccharin, Prof. Ira Remsen, chairman.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT OF THE REFEREE BOARD OF SCIENTIFIC EXPERTS, PROF. IRA REMSEN, CHAIRMAN, JANUARY 13, 1912, ON SACCHARIN.

"1. The findings of the referee board, based upon what would seem to be convincing, experimental evidence, are that small quantities of saccharin, up to 0.3 gram per day, are without deleterious or poisonous action and are not injurious to health. This being so, it would seemingly follow that foods to which small quantities of saccharin have been added—in amount insufficient to result in a daily intake of more than 0.3 gram—can not be considered as adulterated, since foods so treated do not contain any added deleterious ingredient which may render the said food injurious to health.

"Admitting that large quantities of saccharin—over 0.3 gram per day—taken for long periods of time may impair digestion, such evidence can not consistently be accepted as an argument in favor of the view that smaller quantities must constitute a menace to health. It is often claimed that any substance having a deleterious effect on health when taken in large amount must necessarily be injurious, even when consumed in very small quantities, and that it is dangerous to differentiate on the basis of quantity.

"There is, however, no justification for such a view from a physiological standpoint. Common custom, for example, sanctions the free use of vinegar or dilute acetic acid as a preservative; yet it is well known that in large quantities acetic acid is a dangerous substance. Common salt, while harmless when taken in small quantities, may become a serious menace to health if taken in larger quantities. The hydrochloric acid of the gastric juice is not only harmless, but is essential for the welfare of the body; yet when its concentration is increased beyond a certain point it becomes a poison. It is evident, therefore, that the decision as to whether a certain substance is or is not injurious to health must take into account the quantity of the substance that is involved. The referee board is compelled, on the basis of experimental evidence, to hold to the view that addition of small quantities of saccharin to food does not constitute an adulteration, since there is no evidence that small quantities of the substance are deleterious to the health of normal adults.

"2. The addition of saccharin to foods, in large or small quantities, does not, so far as the findings of the referee board show, affect in any way the quality or strength of the food. This statement is not in any sense contradictory to or lacking in harmony with the statement that the addition of saccharin to a food as a substitute for cane sugar is a substitution involving a reduction in the food value of the sweetened product, and may thus result in a reduction in its quality. The simple addition of saccharin to a food can not, in the opinion of the referee board, be considered as an adulteration through any reduction in the strength or quality of the food, since no such effect follows its addition to the food. On the other hand, the substitution of saccharin for cane sugar, for example, in any food product may result in a decided lowering of food value, and this must certainly be considered as an adulteration.

"In the opinion of the referee board, the use of saccharin in food in quantities that might constitute a menace to health is impossible, since its extreme sweetness would naturally limit its consumption by the individual to amounts below what might prove injurious (in harmony with the conclusions expressed in the original report of the board). On the other hand, the possibility of substituting saccharin for sugar, thereby lowering the food value of the sweetened products, is a serious menace, and one that should be carefully safeguarded."

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC HEALTH.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have here Senate concurrent resolution 14, introduced by the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It provides for a survey of the activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government which relate to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto. The resolution provides for the appointment of a committee of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate directs me to report back the resolution favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 14) submitted by Mr. FRANCE October 22, calendar day, October 23, 1919, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be, and is hereby, created, consisting of three Members of the United States Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, to make a survey of and report on those activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government of the United States which relate to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto.

SEC. 2. That such committee is directed and empowered to report to the Congress not later than March 1, 1920—

(a) The statutory powers and duties conferred by the Congress on any department, division, bureau, office, or agency of the United States Government to carry on any work pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health, together with any rules and regulations authorized or promulgated thereunder;

(b) The organizations now existing in the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out these powers and duties, together with the personnel of, appropriations for, and expenditures by each department, division, bureau, office, and agency during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919;

(c) The coordination now existing between said departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies, together with any conflicts, overlapping or duplication of powers, duties, functions, organization, and activities;

(d) The cooperation and coordination now existing between the Government of the United States and the government of the several States or extragovernmental agencies for the conservation or improvement of the public health;

(e) Such further information as such committee may deem proper;

(f) Such recommendations as such committee may deem advisable to offer for the improvement of the public health work of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts, deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution, one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator object?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection. The resolution is a most important one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are here after having taken a recess for the consideration of the treaty, and I can not consent to any matter of that kind coming up at this time. While the resolution may have a very admirable purpose, I think it will require more consideration than can be given under present circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], there being no morning hour, the Senate having taken a recess instead of an adjournment, put into the RECORD quite a lot of telegrams, resolutions, and other literature in relation to the league of nations.

I have here a pamphlet that some one sent to me entitled "World crisis and the League to Enforce Peace," which I assume is sent out by that organization, in which it is stated that up to July 28, 1919, that organization had raised in general subscriptions and membership fees $597,780.85. Whether it has raised money in any other way than by general subscriptions and membership fees deponent further saith not. Since that statement was volunteered three months have passed; the campaign conducted by it has become much more strenuous and insistent; and $1,000 checks are now being demanded peremptorily.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram which was sent to me by Mrs. Eva Mason, of the Connecticut Federation of Women's Clubs, together with her reply to the same.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Connecticut has no objection, I should like to call for a quorum. I suppose he has the usual long list of telegrams.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may have unanimous consent to have this matter read before that is done, I have no objection.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read, and then I desire to call for a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objections either way. The Senator can suit himself. He can suggest the absence of a quorum now.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	McKellar	Smoot
Bankhead	Gerry	McLean	Spencer
Borah	Hale	Moses	Sutherland
Brandegee	Harding	Myers	Swanson
Calder	Harris	New	Thomas
Capper	Henderson	Newberry	Townsend
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Nugent	Trammell
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Overman	Underwood
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Wadsworth
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Kirby	Pomerene	Watson
Dillingham	Knox	Sheppard	Williams
Edge	La Follette	Shields
Fletcher	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
France	McCumber	Smith, Ga.

Mr. GAY. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] on account of sickness.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] on account of illness in their families.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Nevada [Mr PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are absent on public business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] are detained in committee. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are in attendance at a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. Unanimous consent has been given for the reading of certain papers presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONNECTICUT FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Derby, Conn., October 24, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BRANDEGEE: Believing the inclosed message may have a personal interest for you as a Senator, I herewith hand you a telegram addressed to me, from Vance McCormick, chairman of finance committee of the League to Enforce Peace. As I am an advocate of wise reservations for the league of nations covenant, I wired Mr. McCormick "I would regard the contribution of a dollar to the expense of a campaign to secure votes for ratification of the covenant 'without amendments or reservations' an expression of disloyalty to America's best interests." As the president of a woman's organization in the State of Connecticut numbering 6,000 members, I am a bit curious to know how at this date a possibly large campaign fund of American dollars can be exchanged for votes for an unaltered covenant. Any suggestion you may make for my enlightenment will be appreciated.

Asking you to confer the favor of returning the telegram, as I desire to put it on file as a souvenir, I am

Loyally, yours,

EVA CHILD (MRS. JAMES R.) MASON,
President Connecticut Federation of Women's Clubs.

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, October 22, 1919.

MRS. EVA MASON, Derby, Conn.:

In this moral and political crisis League to Enforce Peace—William Howard Taft, president; A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman—has great and necessary responsibility of leading and securing expression of public demand for prompt ratification of peace treaty and league of nations covenant without amendments and without reservations that would require resubmission or separate peace with Germany. Business uncertainty and industrial unrest will continue throughout world until ratification starts life again in normal channels. Will you join others in contributing $500 toward expenses of campaign?

HERBERT HOUSTON, Treasurer,
GEORGE WICKERSHAM,
VANCE MCCORMICK,
CLEVELAND DODGE,
OSCAR STRAUSS,
Finance Committee,
Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] called my attention to the fact that the little souvenir from which I read a minute ago issued by the League to Enforce Peace states that the $597,780.85 which they say they have raised by general subscriptions and membership fees has been received during the four years over which its activities have extended and up to July 28, 1919. They state as a conclusion, I will not say as a warning, that—

When the treaty of peace and the league of nations covenant were submitted to the United States Senate on July 10 the fight for a league of nations entered its final stage.

To which I agree.

With ratification by the Senate, the task which the League to Enforce Peace set itself in 1914 will have been accomplished. Then will remain the further task of assisting to guide the world through the first untried years of cooperation under the league, a task in which the counsel and influence of leaders in all walks of life will be essential.

The gentlemen who are drawing these salaries and leading the world have no intention of relinquishing the snap upon which they have stumbled. Having raised almost three-quarters of a million dollars—pretty nearly the proportions of a national campaign fund—simply by circularizing the benevolent and charitable people to whom they present one side of the controversy, they have no intention of letting go the possibilities developed to educate and lead the world in its moral duties and activities.

I send to the desk now a letter from Mr. R. W. Kellough, of Tulsa, Okla., who sent me the little souvenir from which I have quoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the letter read?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TULSA, OKLA., October 14, 1919.

Senator BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I hand you some of the propaganda being put out by the League to Enforce Peace, which has made an effort to force the patriotic Senators to ratify the league, which would surrender the sovereignty of this country. I am sending you this with full authority for you to use as you may deem best. You and your associates who are opposing the ratification of this fool league of nations are the "minutemen" of the present day, so remember Lexington and Bunker Hill and keep the good work up.

In replying to Senator HITCHCOCK's statement that only thugs and ignorant people are against the league you might call his attention to the breaking up of a meeting at Ardmore, Okla., where Senator JAMES A. REED attempted to speak against the league. This meeting, so it is reported, was broken up by organized thugs gotten together by politicians in that locality, while the majority of the people were in favor of Senator REED's going ahead with the argument and were undoubtedly against the league.

With kindest regards, yours, truly,

R. W. KELLOUGH.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no extended comment to make except that this $600,000, nearly three-quarters of a million dollars, has simply been thrown overboard; that is all there is of it. The sending of these telegrams and hysterical messages all over the country has simply increased the mail receipts and the telegraph tolls. The lady who inquired of me how the money expended can be swapped for votes on this question is onto the game, Mr. President. It can not be swapped for votes and has not been swapped for votes and no vote can be changed or even affected by the expenditure of the whole three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, apropos the reference in one of the communications sent to the desk by the Senator from Connecticut about the "minutemen of liberty" and that sort of thing, I present to the Senate and ask to have inserted in the RECORD the resolution of the Mississippi branch of the American Legion passed at Jackson, Miss., and wired me by the chairman on October 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

VICKSBURG, MISS., October 22, 1919.

Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The State convention of the Mississippi branch of the American Legion at Jackson, Miss., yesterday adopted the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Mississippi State Convention of the American Legion, That this body recommends that the peace treaty be adopted without reservation and that copies of this resolution be sent by wire to President Wilson, Senators WILLIAMS, HARRISON, JOHNSON, and LODGE."

ALEXANDER FITZHUGH, State Chairman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, apropos another letter presented by the Senator from Connecticut about somebody refusing to contribute to the campaign fund of the League to Enforce Peace, I send to the desk and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Herbert S. Houston, treasurer of the League to Enforce Peace, containing an open letter to my old friend, former Speaker CANNON, of the House of Representatives, answering a letter written by him some time ago very similar to the one sent up to the desk by the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[From League to Enforce Peace, 130 West Forty-second Street, New York. Immediate release.]

"In a letter to Representative JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, Herbert S. Houston, treasurer of the League to Enforce Peace, declares that an overwhelming majority of private citizens in this country favor ratification of the peace treaty and the league of nations covenant, and asks the ex-Speaker if he thinks these people have any less regard for the Constitution than the Senators and Congressmen who are attacking the covenant on constitutional grounds.

"Mr. Houston's letter, which was given out here to-day, answered a letter which Mr. CANNON made public recently in Washington, after he had been asked to help finance the campaign of education waged by the League to Enforce Peace in behalf of the league of nations. Mr. Houston's letter follows:

"Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,

"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR MR. CANNON: In your open letter replying to the request for a subscription to the funds of the League to Enforce Peace you say that these funds are to be used to influence Senators to break their constitutional oaths. Your 46 years in Congress must have given you a surprisingly low estimate of the average Senator's capacity and character. Do you think a Senator like HALE, of Maine, any less mindful of his oath of office because he gives heed to the views of his State, again surveys the treaty and the league of nations covenant, and finally decides to vote against the Shantung amendment? Nineteen other Republican Senators did the same thing. Surely they are not 'serving two masters' in listening to the arguments and opinions of their constituencies before reaching their final decision on the treaty and the covenant. And every dollar of the funds to which you were asked to contribute—I can speak from full knowledge as treasurer of the league—goes toward educational effort to enlighten the country on the meaning of the covenant and on the country's duty to join the league of nations in order to make permanent the peace which our soldiers helped to win.

"The 14,000 ministers of the gospel who have just petitioned the Senate to ratify the treaty with the covenant must be familiar with the passage of Scripture you quote in your letter and also with the Constitution of their country, and still they join in an urgent plea for the league of nations. You would not, I am sure, deny them this ancient democratic right of petition or claim that its exercise was an effort to influence Senators to break their oaths of office. You sat at the feet of Abraham Lincoln too long to think anything so opposed as that would be to the spirit of our institutions. The League to Enforce Peace holds to the sound Lincoln maxim that you can't 'fool all the people all of the time,' and that is the reason it is undertaking to help enlighten them on the issues involved in this great league of nations contest. And they are surely being enlightened, as you will find if you take the trouble to check up the sentiment in the Danville district or in any other section of the country.

"As an index to public sentiment, let me remind you that at the convention of the American Bankers' Association in St. Louis the other day a referendum vote taken by a St. Louis newspaper of the twelve hundred and odd delegates showed over 800 of them in favor of the ratification of the treaty and covenant without amendments or reservations, and only 27 votes were recorded as being against the ratification of the treaty. As a wise and successful banker yourself, you know how accurately the banker, and particularly the country banker, can gauge the sentiment of his community. And this referendum among American bankers showed the same result that hundreds of referendums among all classes of people throughout the country have shown. The referendum vote in the American Federation of Labor was practically in the same proportion as the vote of members of the American Bankers' Association. Is it possible for you to believe that these people, undoubtedly representing an overwhelming majority of your fellow countrymen, have any less regard for the Constitution of the United States or for the sovereignty of America than have you or any other Senator or Congressmen?

"With kind personal regards, I am,

"Yours, faithfully,

"(Signed) HERBERT S. HOUSTON,

"Treasurer."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, in conclusion, Mr. President, I will read this, because it is a letter from three senators from Massachusetts—Winchester, Mass. I do not know them, but perhaps the Senators from Massachusetts do.

Mr. LODGE. Three senators from Winchester, Mass.?

Mr. WILLIAMS (reading):

We earnestly urge immediate ratification of the peace treaty and covenant of the league of nations with no reservations that require reopening of negotiations at Paris.

I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware that Winchester had three senators in the legislature, but I have no doubt they have.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

WINCHESTER, MASS., October 22, 1919.

TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Care of Hon. JOHN S. WILLIAMS.

DEAR SIRS: We earnestly urge immediate ratification of the peace treaty and covenant of the league of nations with no reservations that require reopening of negotiations at Paris.

Respectfully,

A. C. NEWELL.
F. M. NEWELL.
E. P. BOND.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask to have read the resolutions of the American Legion, Georgia Division, adopted at Atlanta, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"THE AMERICAN LEGION, GEORGIA DIVISION,
"Atlanta, Ga.

"Be it resolved, And it is hereby resolved by the American Legion, Georgia Division, in convention assembled at Atlanta, Ga., October 15, 1919, that it is the sense of this convention that the treaty of peace as submitted to the Senate of the United States and embodying the league of nations should be adopted as submitted without reservation, amendment, or interpretation; and it is further

"Resolved, That the Senators of the State of Georgia be furnished copies of this resolution and that they be requested to support the treaty of peace and vote against any reservation, interpretation, or amendment thereto."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, in reply to what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] presented in criticism of the League to Enforce Peace, a statement showing the nature of its organization, its officers, the method of its financing, the use of league funds, a report of its State and county branches, the official commitments of the league, the character and type of work carried on by the league, and the national provisional committee of the league—in fact, a complete statement of the League to Enforce Peace.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"I. ORGANIZATION.

"The League to Enforce Peace was organized as the response of a large group of leading Americans to the greatest moral crisis of history—the outbreak of the European war. It was felt that something must be done to organize the world against the recurrence of such a catastrophe. About a hundred and twenty-five leaders of American thought of all political parties, creeds, and professions joined in the call for the organization meeting in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, June 17, 1915. Several hundred of the leaders of the Nation, comprising many of the outstanding figures in international law, politics, political science, and letters, equally representative with the callers of the convention, came together and, through the organization of the League to Enforce Peace, began the movement for the establishment of a league of nations. The representative character, the disinterested motives, the nonpartisan nature of the league have remained to this day as definite and distinct as at that time. (For list of provisional committee on organization see Exhibit A.)

"II. OFFICERS.

"The league has been officered from the beginning, both as to its national organization and as to its State and local branches, by the most prominent and high-minded men of the Nation—by men who not only have received no compensation but who have contributed largely both of their time and their means to carry through what they have conceived to be a necessary public service. The president of the league is ex-President William Howard Taft; its vice president, Alton B. Parker; the chairman of the executive committee, President A. Lawrence Lowell, of Harvard University. Its vice presidents include some 300 men of national reputation, and its national committee is composed of several hundred more of the outstanding leaders from such great national groups as organized labor, agriculture, chambers of commerce, women's clubs, and national industries. (For list of national officers see Exhibit B.)

"III. FINANCING.

"During the four years over which its activities have extended the league has raised (June 17, 1915–June 1, 1919) $547,408.82 in general subscriptions and membership fees. The largest single subscription made to it by any individual has been $25,000 and the next largest $5,000. The approximate number of its subscriptions is 6,575, of which only 132 are $1,000 or over; and the average subscription is $83. Not a dollar of the income of the league has been derived from the Carnegie or Rockefeller Foundations. Its money, on the contrary, has been derived chiefly from people of moderate means who have believed that the establishment of the league of nations, by preventing future wars, would operate to the untold advantage of future generations and to the upbuilding of civilization. These funds have been contributed for the most part at the conventions of the league—in the organization meeting in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, in June, 1915; in the Washington convention of the league in May, 1916; in the convention of the league in Philadelphia in May, 1918; and in connection with the regional congresses held in nine of the leading cities of the Nation, stretching from coast to coast, in February, 1919.

"IV. USE OF LEAGUE FUNDS.

"Since its organization (June 17, 1915–June 1, 1919) the league has expended $545,163.80, as follows:

1. Executive direction	$44,048.93
2. Organization of branches	84,150.54
3. Office salaries, supplies, and operating expenses	89,767.30
4. National conventions	28,628.51
5. National congresses	99,395.57
6. State conventions	8,040.66
7. Publications	28,604.52
8. Publicity	51,530.46
9. Home extension	61,868.22
10. Foreign extension	5,070.56
11. Financial campaigns	20,713.27
12. Postage, not included in above classifications	23,345.26

"V. STATE AND COUNTY BRANCHES.

"There are active branches of the league in 26 State and in 520 counties and smaller political subdivisions. State, county, and local officers number approximately 2,281. Of these not more than 10, all of whom occupy minor positions, receive any salary whatsoever; the remainder contributing their time and influence, and often their means, to accomplish the purpose of the league. The following is a list of the more active State organizations and their chairmen.

"STATE CHAIRMEN.

"VI. SPEAKERS.

"The plan and arguments for a league of nations have been presented throughout the Nation before audiences of every character, by the type of volunteer speakers who performed such public-spirited service during the war. At the present time—June 1, 1919—approximately 13,000 speakers are enrolled and definitely pledged to the League to Enforce Peace as ready to give and as actually giving educational addresses on the subject of a league of nations. They represent the following major groups:

Labor	3,149
Agricultural interests	343
The church	3,000
Business and other groups	6,804

"These speakers work wholly without compensation, their expenses, with few exceptions, being paid either by themselves or by the organizations which they address. In order to meet emergencies a small number of staff speakers (never more than three at any time) have received modest salary or fees for addresses.

"VII. TYPE OF WORK CARRIED ON BY THE LEAGUE.

"The work of the League to Enforce Peace has been of an educational nature directed, first, toward the development throughout the country of an understanding of the general international situation as it will exist at the close of the war; second, toward an understanding of the main features of a league of nations which might create and maintain peace; and, third (since the publication of the league of nations covenant), to the giving of exact and detailed information regarding the league of nations covenant and its interpretation. The league has carried forward a campaign of education covering questions of the war and kind of settlement necessary in order to secure permanent peace.

"VIII. OFFICIAL COMMITMENTS OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"That support of the project for a league of nations throughout the United States is not local or superficial in character and that it has not been merely improvised or induced by the activities of the League to Enforce Peace is apparent from the large number of National and State organizations that have committed themselves to the principle of a league of nations and in large part to the Paris covenant as now given to the world. Among such organizations are the following:

"A. The great church denominations of the country are, so far as known, committed without exception to the establishment of a league of nations. Some of the more conspicuous indorsements are as follows: General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, General Synod Evangelical Lutheran Churches in the United States of America, Religious Education Association, National Society of Christian Endeavor, Board of Bishops of the United Brethren in Christ, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

"B. Every representative organization of farmers and agricultural interests throughout the country is officially committed to the establishment of a league, including the National Board of Farm Organizations, the National Grange, the National Federation of Gleaners, the American Society of Equity, the Nonpartisan League, the Southern Commercial Congress, the American Agricultural Association and the Farmers' National Council, and the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

"C. The American Federation of Labor pledged itself to the establishment of a league of nations as part of its reconstruction program in its annual convention of November, 1916, at Baltimore, Md., and has committed itself in all its succeeding annual conventions to this policy. The brotherhoods of railway employees in like manner stand pledged to a league. With the exception of the international socialists, American labor is believed to stand solidly in favor of a league and of the Paris covenant as the embodiment of the league for which they ask.

"D. The educational associations and the college and university faculties stand with practical unanimity in favor of a league of nations, as shown by official acts and commitments.

"E. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, by official referendum taken in November, 1915, stands committed by an overwhelming vote to the principle of a league of nations.

"F. Twenty-six State legislatures, by joint or concurrent resolutions, have, June 1, 1919, recorded themselves in favor of a league and only two against, as follows:

"For: Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Wisconsin, Washington.

"Against: New Mexico, West Virginia.

"NOTE.—This list includes only those States in which both of the legislative branches have adopted the favorable or unfavorable resolution. There were also the following one-house resolutions; California, house for; Colorado, house for, senate against; Idaho, house against; Indiana, senate for.

"G. The organized women of the United States have adopted numerous resolutions indorsing the league, notably the following: The National American Woman's Suffrage Association; National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution; General Federation of Women's Clubs (2,000,000 women); National Council of Women (composed of national organizations comprising 3,000,000 women); Council of Jewish Women; Dames of Malta; Woman's Auxiliary Southern Commercial Congress.

"H. Scores of national and State organizations of every character stand pledged to a league. (See Exhibit "C.")

"In a very large number of cases the organizations passing resolutions have also made use of their organizational machinery in various ways to spread information regarding a league and the Paris covenant and otherwise to forward the movement for a league."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before I take my seat I desire to refer also to the statement made by the correspondent of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the effect that I had declared that no one opposed the league of nations except socialists, Bolshevists, and anarchists. I made no such statement. What I said was that the organized efforts in the United States against the league of nations consisted of organizations for political purposes, for the purpose of making political capital, and outside of that in the United States there was no church organization, no women's organization, no labor organization, no business organization, no educational organization, and no organization of a nonpartisan character having for its purpose the welfare of the country that supported those Senators who are here antagonizing and seeking to destroy the league of nations as a method of securing international peace. I declared, furthermore, and I repeat, that there are certain organizations in the United States and in other countries anxiously at work to destroy the league of nations, and that those organizations are the anarchists, the Bolshevists, and the organized enemies of society and of government everywhere; and that is true not only in the United States but it is true in other countries as well.

In the New York Times of yesterday this special cablegram appeared. It is from Berne, Switzerland:

Swiss Presidents have hitherto been spared from molestation by anarchists or madmen, but since the Bolshevist propaganda has penetrated this small Republic even the venerable and highly respected chief of State, M. Ador, has been the victim of something much resembling an attempt on his life.

Yesterday an individual named Weissenbach, pushing aside the President's woman secretary, forced an entrance in M. Ador's room and is reported to have seized the President by the throat. He might have strangled M. Ador had not the brother of the Swiss defense minister rushed in and rescued him.

Weissenbach was one of those who recently took part in a meeting in opposition to Switzerland joining the league of nations. It is not yet known whether he is a Bolshevik or is crazy or both.

Last Sunday, when Federal Councilor Callonder was addressing a mass meeting at Winterthur in favor of Switzerland joining the league, a number of Bolsheviki attempted unsuccessfully to break up the meeting. It is now believed that the Bolsheviki and the Pan Germans are cooperating in an endeavor to prevent Switzerland from becoming a member of the league.

Nevertheless, the Swiss Government, realizing that should Switzerland not join the league within the stipulated time Geneva might not become the league seat, has called a special session of Parliament for November 10 to decide the question. As the decision must finally come to a referendum, many of the ablest Swiss intellectuals, historians, and others are addressing mass meetings explaining the objects of the league, and they urge that Switzerland join it immediately.

This would probably have been needless but for the pro-German and Bolshevist propaganda and press. All Swiss newspapers which during the war served the cause of the German general staff are now opposing the league, while all which were and are friendly to the Entente, including the entire French-Swiss press, are advocating it.

President Wilson's illness has cast a positive gloom over French Switzerland, and is sincerely deplored by leading German Swiss papers, such as the Neue Züricher Zeitung. Although it would hardly be credited, yet Bolshevist, Sinn Fein, and pro-German circles are positively rejoicing, and the hope is openly expressed that, now that the President lies prostrate, his senatorial opponents will succeed in wrecking his policy and prevent America from joining the league.

Mr. President, that is only a sample of the news that comes from all over the world, that the Bolshevists and the lawless elements and the enemies of society and those who oppose stable government everywhere in the world object to this league of nations. They are the organized plotters against it in other countries, and they are the organized bodies against it in the United States. Where are any church organizations opposing the league of nations? Where are any business men's organizations opposing the league of nations? Where are any labor organizations opposing the league of nations in the United States? Where are any educational organizations in the United States opposing the league of nations? Where are any such organizations having at heart the welfare of the country, the stability of government, and the public welfare, opposing the idea of the nations getting together and organizing for the peace of the world? There are none such.

Mr. President, heretofore the world has been organized for war. This is an effort to organize the nations for peace; and the reason that the Bolshevists and the anarchists and the enemies of society everywhere object to organizing the world for peace is that they fear it will stabilize government and prevent the arrival of anarchy.

I do not say that Senators are purposely cooperating with such organizations; but I repeat, and I challenge contradiction, that every newspaper in the United States published in the interest of anarchy, extreme socialism, and Bolshevism, without any exception, is opposing the league of nations, and every organization of that character which is opposed to the stability of society and of government is also opposing it.

I say this merely in reply to the correspondent of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who seems to resent the statement I made that those organizations are opposing the league of nations.

Senators may not like the partnership; they may not like to have that sort of support in their effort to defeat the league of nations; but they have it, whether they want it or not.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of discussing briefly the question which is supposed to be now before the Senate, and that is the first amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, intended to secure equality of voting to the United States in the council and assembly of the league of nations.

I intend to vote for that amendment, as I voted for it in the committee. I am aware that it is inadequate for the purposes for which it is intended; I am aware that if the second amendment is also adopted it still remains in a degree inadequate; but, Mr. President, I vote for it because I believe most profoundly in the principle which it is intended to carry out. I shall vote gladly to make it more adequate, if that is desired by the Senate. I shall vote gladly for a reservation, if it is necessary to have that in order to make the principle of equal voting more effective.

In saying that, Mr. President, I trust nobody will imagine that because I differ from them as to the correctness of voting for this amendment I in any way intend to impugn their patriotism or their motives. To me it is inconceivable that any man who has at heart the welfare, the safety, and the independence of the United States should be willing to vote for the ratification of this treaty without reservation or amendment. Yet I do not question in the slightest degree the patriotism or the motives of those who take a different view. Still less do I question the motives of those who have the same purpose that I have, which is to protect our right to an equal vote in the council and assembly of the league, but who prefer to proceed by reservation rather than amendment. Senators who prefer reservations, but who have the same purpose that I have, I have no question are just as thoroughly American and patriotic as I am. Men who are aiming at the same purpose and trying to attain the same object may differ as to methods, but that does not imply that they are not equally honest in their desire for the general result.

Mr. President, I did not intend to go further on this point, but the Senator from Nebraska has just gone through his favorite morning rehearsal of the organizations and of the very worthy people who favor the league of nations without amendment or without reservation and, I may add, usually without reading more than the title of the instrument. My own personal belief is—and it is based upon letters and resolutions without number, with which I have not sought to load the RECORD—that the great mass of the American people to-day, if we could put the treaty to a popular vote, would be against ratifying the league as it stands. The great majority of the American people to-day, in my judgment, are either against any league or demand effective reservations in order to protect amply and thoroughly the United States.

It is worse than idle, Mr. President, to attempt in an indirect fashion to imply that those who take the view which I and others hold are Bolshevists and socialists and pro-German. I am not concerned to defend my record in the war. I think it speaks for itself. I think my votes will be found to have been unbrokenly against Germany at a time when some others were inclined to cast and did cast votes which I thought were at least sympathetic with Germany and her cause. I do not think anything is gained by such charges as I have described.

Mr. President, there is one thing which I think it would be well to have understood, and that is that there are many Senators in this body whose votes can not be determined by guesses at public opinion or by anyone's convenience. There are many Senators here—a large majority, I think—who are wholly indifferent to what their own political future may be, who care nothing for party advantage or disadvantage, but who profoundly believe, and their belief rests upon the deepest conviction, that this treaty as it stands endangers the safety, the independence, and the welfare of the United States in the future; and no outside pressure, no testimonials to the virtues of the League to Enforce Peace, have the slightest effect upon them. They make up their own minds as to what they think the best interests of their own country demand, and they are not to be guided or influenced by outside pressure, and least of all by being told what Europe wants. The mischief in this treaty lies in the fact, and the reason that it was hung here is, that it was made up with the sole view of what Europe wanted, and the rights and interests of the United States were forgotten too completely by some of the gentlemen who purported to represent us in Paris.

Mr. President, I wish to say something more direct in regard to the pending amendment. One of the objections which has been made to amendments, and which has been a very effective and very unreal objection, is that an amendment would require a reconvening of the peace conference and cause great delay. The peace conference can not be reconvened, because it has never gone out of session. The representatives of all the signatory powers are sitting in Paris at this moment and have been for nearly a year past. They are still engaged in parceling out Europe. They are still engaged in telling other countries what they are to do, which some of the countries totally disregard, as in the case of Roumania; and they are very diligently occupied. They are there and can consider any amendment, and consider it quickly, if we should send it to them. They are in session. It would be perfectly easy, if necessary, to recall them, but it is not necessary; or an amendment could be sent by a note to each power, but that is not necessary. We are not delaying the ratification, for, if I am correctly informed, no ratifications have yet been deposited, and until deposited with the official authority in Paris the ratification is not complete.

But, Mr. President, the proposition that the Senate must not amend the treaty is equivalent to nullifying the power of the Senate. The Senate in the past has amended some 70 treaties—I think that is the number now—I mean amended, not put on reservations. Those amendments have been accepted, and the treaties have gone into effect. We began with the first and one of the most famous treaties, the Jay treaty, in 1795. That was a treaty which had a profound influence upon the condition of the country at the time, and upon its future as well. Washington had determined that it was above all things essential to keep the country out of war, and for that purpose to secure the withdrawal of the English posts on our western frontier. In order to bring about that settlement he sacrificed, as was shown a year or two later, the alliance which we had had with France. It was a very great and a very wise act. In that treaty the Senate made a very important amendment in regard to one clause. It was accepted and the treaty became a law.

This amendment does not touch the treaty with Germany; it is an amendment to one of the league provisions. Therefore, it does not have to go to Germany, which was another bugbear that has been put forward with great effect. Germany is not a member of the league. She is not in the list of those invited to accede. Whenever she is admitted to the league she will take the league as she finds it, because in the interval the league has full power to make amendments. This was admitted by the President in the conversation which the Foreign Relations Committee held with him at the White House—that the right of amendment was undoubted, and that Germany would have to take the league as she found it. The point is too obvious to argue.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. LODGE. I will.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. While the Senator says the right to amend the league is undoubted, what does he think of the possibility of amending it as a practicable thing?

Mr. LODGE. You mean under the provision of the league for amendment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; under article 26.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is practically unamendable. That article, as I read it, requires that each country should agree to the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Every member having representation in the council, and a majority of all the other members.

Mr. LODGE. It reads:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All the members——

Mr. LODGE. "The members of the league" means the countries which are members. It continues:

> Whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

It is very plain to me that in the language "whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly" the words "whose representatives compose" are purely descriptive. I do not think there can be any question whatever that any amendment to this league would have to be submitted to the ratifying power in each country, just as a treaty is submitted.

Those who are represented on the council, the nine countries, would, under the provision of this league, have to be unanimous. If I may draw a parallel, it is very much as if we provided that in amending the Constitution the Thirteen Original States must all agree unanimously to an amendment and a majority of the other States in order to carry an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator read the rest of article 26?

Mr. LODGE (reading):

No such amendment shall bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.

That is a slight digression. I do not think the amending provision is practically of any value. Still, the amending power is there in that form.

Now, another point in regard to Germany's acceptance, of which I was speaking. Even if Germany had any right to say anything, which she has not, it would be very easy to make her agree to any amendment. The allied and associated powers have already compelled her to change her constitution in regard to the annexation of Austria, and if they can do that they certainly could secure her agreement to any amendment we choose to make. But it would not be necessary to submit it to her.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the amendment. I have no feeling whatever growing out of the fact that it is Great Britain which has six votes. I should feel just as strongly about it if France, Italy, or any other of the signatories of the league had the same superiority of voting.

During the years of neutrality I did all I could, in my humble way, in the Senate to defend the policies of England in regard to the blockade, a blockade based chiefly on international decisions made by us during the Civil War. I defended the policy of England in that respect at a time when the ranks of the defenders of the English policy were not overcrowded. It is with no feeling whatever, therefore, because it happens to be the British Empire which has these six votes that I advocate equality in voting power. I find no fault with Great Britain, because it was her draft of the league which was taken as its basis. That was wholly within her right, of course. I think perhaps it would have been as wise, more judicious, if she had left the explanation of article 21, covering the Monroe doctrine, to us. But her delegation gave an official and a correct interpretation of that article. I find no fault whatever with the fact that the secretary general of the league, which is the most important office, and its occupant, the man who will have greater influence than anyone else, is Sir Eric Drummond; or that Sir Herbert Ames, of Toronto, Canada, should be the financial director of the permanent secretariat of the league; or that Sir David Henderson of England should be the director general of the Red Cross societies league, organized under article 25 of the covenant; or that Mr. W. A. Appleton was recently elected president of the international division of trade unions in preparation for the labor conference to be held here in October under the auspices of the league. If the other members of the league wish these four great offices to be in the hands of Great Britain, I have not a word to say; I have no possible objection to it. I have no doubt that these gentlemen will perform their duties well.

Nor, Mr. President, do I grudge Great Britain anything she receives under the treaty. The valor, the wonderful fighting, of her armies, through four years, have my deepest admiration. The splendor of her sacrifices all the world admires, and the silent fortitude and undaunted courage of her people are beyond the need of praise. Though all the nations won the war, and we had the good fortune to come in and turn the scale at the last and most crucial moment, no one can deny that it was owing to the fleet of Great Britain that the war was not early lost. I say I grudge her nothing that she receives. But there is one point, Mr. President, at which I stop. I do not think that she or any other country should have more votes in the league of nations than we have.

Mr. President, when the peace conference was called the old international rule that each nation, whether small or large, was a sovereign entity and therefore was entitled to a vote equal to that of any other nation was recognized. I was unable to see then, and I can not see now, how any other rule could be adopted. When it came to the voting in the league, it seemed to me that whatever defect there might be in the general international rule, it was the only practicable one. The only alternative would have been a democratic division of votes according to population, and that seemed to present a great many complications.

If we had gone on the principle of 1 vote for every 10,000,000 inhabitants, for instance, China would have had 40 delegates; of course, if England had counted India in she would have had 35 delegates from India, besides her own. But China would have had 40 delegates to 4 from France, 4 from Great Britain, and 10 from the United States. I merely mention this as an illustration of the difficulty of granting votes on the basis of population. Therefore we adhered to the old rule that each nation, great or small, should have one vote.

But before the terms of the league were agreed to or the treaty signed, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, and India were made members of the league. Of course, four of those are self-governing dominions. The basis on which India was put in, I have never been able to discover. In addition, there is no doubt that Great Britain controls entirely the vote of the Kingdom of Hejaz; and, also, when Persia becomes a member, will control the vote of Persia.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And Portugal.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and probably others. But those are questions with which we have nothing to do.

Under the treaty as it stands, the fact remains that England has six votes and we have one. I think that is an unsound basis for the league. I think it is wrong in principle, and that it will tend to promote ill feeling and not make for peace or good will. I suppose that we could have insisted that we should have a vote for Porto Rico and a vote for the Philippines and a vote for Guam and a vote for the Virgin Islands, three of them self-governing dominions, if you choose to apply that test; and the other, Guam, is a part of the territory of the United States. I should be very sorry myself to see the United States attempt to secure voting power in that way.

Now, Mr. President, I am very far from wishing that the four self-governing dominions of England should not be members of the league. They are entitled to it by their services, their sacrifices, and their character. I do not wish to deprive one of them of a vote. I am glad they are in the league. I could have spared the Sultan of Hejaz, but I am glad to have Canada in the league; I should be very sorry if she were not there. But I think that we should come back to the principle which ought not to be abandoned, and that if the league is to go on we should have an equal vote with Great Britain.

I have looked up in the last Whitaker's Almanac, which is an English publication—apparently their last censuses are not later than 1911—and I find that the total white population of the British Empire was 59,000,000—England and Wales, 36,070,492; Scotland, 4,760,904; Ireland, 4,390,219; Canada, 7,250,000; Australia, 5,000,000; New Zealand, 1,200,000; and the Union of South Africa, 1,276,242; in all, 59,947,857. That population has probably increased since 1911. But even allowing for any unreasonable rate of increase, the population of the United States still exceeds all the white population of the British Empire. Therefore, on the basis of population alone, we should have an equal vote.

Mr. President, as this is a matter that has been somewhat discussed, I wish to show what I have never doubted, what I think is clear on the face of the instrument, precisely the interpretation given to it by Great Britain, by the Canadians, and by South Africa. I am not wise enough to say what the gentlemen who made these utterances meant in the recesses of their inner consciousness. I am simple, and I can not go beyond what they said. This has been read before, but it will do no harm to read it again; it is brief:

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt, it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

If that is not a statement that Canada may be placed in the council, or New Zealand, or any of them, I am unable to see how language could be plainer. That statement is signed by M. Clemenceau, President Woodrow Wilson, and David Lloyd-George.

Sir Robert Borden, who is a very able man, made a speech before the Canadian Parliament. I think it has heretofore been printed in the RECORD, but I desire to read a few passages from it. He begins by saying:

The status of the dominions at the peace conference was the subject of long and earnest discussion. Various methods, which it is not necessary to explain, were suggested. In the end I proposed that there should be a distinctive representation for each dominion similar to that accorded to the smaller allied powers—

Nobody has any doubt whatever as to the vote and power the smaller allied powers have in the league—and, in addition, that the British Empire representation of five delegates should be selected from day to day from a panel made up of representatives of the United Kingdom and the dominions.

That reference is to the delegates to the peace conference, and they were changed so as to allow representation to the various British dominions. He then says:

At first strong objection was made to the proposed representation of the British dominions. Subsequently there was a full discussion in the British Empire delegation, at which a firm protest was made against any recession from the proposal adopted in London. In the end that proposal was accepted.

Then, later he says:

I proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should, in respect of the Dominions, be signified by the signature of the Dominion plenipotentiaries.

That was adopted. Then, he says:

So that the Dominions appear therein as signatories and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

This important constitutional development involved the issuance by the King, as high contracting party, of full powers to the various Dominion plenipotentiary delegates. In order that such powers issued to the Canadian plenipotentiaries might be based upon formal action of the Canadian Government, an order in council was passed on April 10, 1919, granting the necessary authority. Accordingly, I addressed a communication to the prime minister of the United Kingdom requesting that necessary and appropriate steps should be taken to establish the connection between this order in council and the issuance of the full powers by His Majesty, so that it might formally appear of record that they were issued on the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

Then, speaking of the Dominions, he says:

They are to become members as signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members.

If anything can be clearer than that, I do not know how it can be made clearer. The rights, the vote, and the authority of other signatory members are undisputed. Then, he says:

The future relationship of the nations of the empire must be determined in accordance with the will of the mother country and of each Dominion in a constitutional conference to be summoned in the not distant future. Undoubtedly it will be based upon equality of nationhood. Each nation must preserve unimpaired its absolute autonomy, but it must likewise have its voice as to those external relations which involve the issue of peace or of war. So that the Britannic commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded on the 28th of last June.

The same powers being reposed in the world league of nations as in the British league of nations.

On behalf of my country, I stood firmly upon this solid ground: That in this, the greatest of all wars, in which the world's liberty, the world's justice—in short, the world's future destiny—were at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifices had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources, and population, no more complete in their sovereignty and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

That is, he understood, and understood correctly, that they stand on the same ground as every other signatory, each of whom has one independent vote. If they stand on the same ground, each of the British colonies will have one independent vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has been argued by some distinguished advocates of the league that in a controversy between the United States and the British Empire to be submitted to the assembly for decision the United States, being a party in interest, is excluded and Great Britain and her five colonies would all be excluded. I should like to know if that is the view of the Senator from Massachusetts, or whether or not, upon the premises which he has laid down, the colonies, occupying in the league an equal status in every respect with other signatories and there being nothing in the league to the effect just stated, that those colonies would sit and vote as independent nations?

Mr. LODGE. Sir Robert Borden has declared in the plainest terms that they have the rights of every signatory nation. Every signatory nation has one independent vote, and the British colonies each have one independent vote, not to be determined by the British Empire in any way at all. Nothing could be clearer. If more evidence were needed, let me read what Gen. Smuts, who was one of the principal makers of the draft, said in regard to the relations of Great Britain and the dominions at the meeting of the Parliament of the Union of South Africa, at Cape Town on September 10. The dispatch is from the London Times and is dated September 10. Gen. Smuts said:

Regarding the league of nations, it was incorrect to say that in the league the British Empire was a unit. The Empire was a group, but South Africa had exactly the same rights and voice as England. Though England was a permanent member of the central council, South Africa could be elected to that council.

What could be plainer than that? Gen. Smuts, who was one of the principal makers of the instrument, so interprets it. There can not be any question that the British dominions will each have a separate vote.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, am I justified in understanding from that letter that England and South Africa might both be represented on the council at the same time?

Mr. LODGE. I think there is no question as to that. There is no limitation in the statement of Lloyd-George, Clemenceau, and the President in which, without qualification, they declare the British colonies to be eligible to the council.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will pardon me further, some have taken the position that the British Empire was entitled only to one representative on the council, and if that one representative came from Canada, then there could be no other representative from the British Empire.

Mr. LODGE. I see nothing whatever to justify that view. The statement is plain. Sir Robert Borden and Gen. Smuts, both able men, certainly were there and knew what they were doing, and they have stated that each of the self-governing dominions, including, of course, India, occupies the same position as that occupied by Belgium or Spain or any other country as a member of the league. It is the right of Belgium, if she has the opportunity, to have a representative on the council. If, as they state—and state correctly—the rights of the British colonies are the same as the rights of Belgium, which is one of the smaller signatory powers mentioned by them, they can not be deprived of the right to sit on the council.

Mr. President, I am not going to go over the well-trodden ground as to where the six votes count.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Assuming to be correct the position just taken by the Senator in regard to Canada and other dominions of the British Empire becoming members of the council, so that the empire might have more than one representative on the council, I should like to ask the Senator if that could occur except by the vote of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. No; it could not as the treaty now stands as to additional; but that does not alter the principle. It could be done, however, without the vote of the United States in the case of electing new members of the league. New members can be elected by two-thirds of the assembly; there is no limitation in that respect; and in constituting two-thirds of the assembly, of course, Great Britain has six votes to start with and two or three others that she controls, which will be a help toward electing her candidate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that if the British Empire were a party in interest and Canada were a member of the council, Canada could cast a vote?

Mr. LODGE. It is not necessary to state the case with reference to membership upon the council. The British Empire would have five votes in the assembly, if the dispute were taken there. If the British colonies have, as Sir Robert Borden and Gen. Smuts say they have, and as I think the treaty provides beyond a doubt, all the rights of other signatory powers their five votes can not be taken away from them. There is nothing in the treaty to justify a contrary conclusion.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. In answering the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] a few moments ago the Senator, as I understood him, said that one of the British dominions or provinces could not be elected on the council without the consent of the United States. I am not sure that that is the proper construction of the league covenant. Article 4 provides:

The council shall consist of representatives of principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly, representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece shall be members of the council.

The question is whether it is a fact that there is required a unanimous vote in the assembly in the case of the election of new members to the council. Let us see. Article 5 provides:

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or the council shall require the agreement of all of the members of the league represented at the meeting.

All matters of procedure at meetings of the assembly or of the council, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the assembly or by the council, and may be decided by a majority of the members of the league represented at the meeting.

I hardly think that anyone would say that the election of a member of the council would be a "decision." A decision implies the passing upon a dispute where there is a controverted point, such as courts decide. It implies that the council is then sitting as a judicial body, while the matter of an election is one of procedure. Therefore I think that a majority can elect.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator about that. I answered the question of the Senator from New Mexico in a general way. On the face of the covenant as it stands, it may be contended, I think, that in the case of the election of additional members of the league whose representatives shall also be members of the council a unanimous vote of the council would be required. On the question of filling the four places which are left to the discretion of the assembly, however, I am very clear that they can be filled by the assembly alone, and that a unanimous vote is not required.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought perhaps the Senator had not fully grasped the question.

Mr. LODGE. I did not guard my reply sufficiently. Of course, there is a great deal of dispute over that point, but I think we shall find that it will be decided in the way the Senator and I think it can be decided.

I am not blaming England for getting in her dominions. Take, for instance, the first article:

> Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly.

That is wholly a matter for the determination of the assembly. There the six votes of England count, and we have only one, and there is no veto possible by the requisition of unanimity.

England has Newfoundland, just as much entitled as Canada, as a self-governing dominion, to come in. It so happens that the only States that the words "self-governing dominion" exactly cover are English possessions. I do not wonder that England did it. I find no fault with her. She was looking after her own interests there. It was her duty to do it. It was perfectly right that she should. Where I find the fault is that we had nobody who cared for our interests as those of Great Britain were cared for.

Mr. President, I am not going over the points where they have their six votes to our one. They have been gone over many times, and will be gone over many times more. I have not any doubt, in the case of a dispute—I am not speaking now of a dispute with Canada or Great Britain, but a dispute between the United States and Japan—that England would have her six votes and we should have none; and if Great Britain herself were in a dispute, I think her five colonies would all have their votes just as much as Belgium and Italy would have their votes. They stand on the same ground.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this matter has been discussed all the time as though England had six votes only. As I remember, Persia is one of the countries invited to become a member of the league.

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned Persia and the Kingdom of Hejaz. Of course, England controls both those votes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was just going to call attention to the fact that The Nation, of London, has referred to that in stating that under this treaty negotiated right along while the league of nations covenant was pending, evidently hurried before it was perfected, England has taken over Persia, and will rule it completely—appoint all of its officers, run all of its internal affairs, and receive all of its revenues. In other words, it has a more complete control over Persia now than it has over India.

Mr. LODGE. It has complete control of its finances and its army, which gives it control of the country.

All I wish to say in conclusion—and I have taken more time than I had intended—is that what I am interested in, in this amendment, in any other form of it that may be presented, or in any reservation, is the principle involved. I can not, for myself, consent or admit that in the great assembly of the nations the vote of the United States should not be equal to that of any other power. You may turn and twist it as you please; Great Britain and her self-governing dominions, and India, which is a mere chattel of the Empire, have six votes and we have one in the assembly. That is something that I for one can not possibly agree to; and I propose to vote against it in whatever form of amendment, or reservation, or both, or either, it is presented. I will never admit for myself personally that the United States, in the great council of the nations, shall occupy a place of inferiority in power and in representation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before proceeding to answer the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I wish to refer to two statements just made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I think he has not been entirely fair, although I know that he intends to be, in the broad declaration that Great Britain has six votes, carrying the assumption that there are six votes which Great Britain can declare upon every occasion; that the vote of Canada, the vote of India, the votes of Australia and South Africa can always be placed by Great Britain.

Of course, if the United States should be allowed six votes, those six votes would be cast by one entity and not by six different entities. Let us suppose that India insists that her citizens should have the right of emigration to Canada and settle in Canada——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment; let me finish the sentence—and that dispute in any way should come before the council or the assembly, and that the vote of India should be in favor of the emigration of Indians to Canada, and the vote of Canada without any possible question would be against it. Now, how could it be said that Great Britain cast either the vote of India or the vote of Canada? She could not cast them both, because they would be diametrically opposed to each other. If the question were a question of the right of Chinese or Indians to emigrate to South Africa and the white representative of South Africa opposed it and the Indian representative voted in favor of it, how could Great Britain cast the votes of both India and South Africa? I submit those two instances to show the fallacy of the claim that Great Britain has these votes.

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not mean to imply that Great Britain could always command the votes of the four self-governing dominions. Of course, I do not think India is a happy example of what the Senator is speaking about, because the vote of India is cast from Downing Street. She has no opinion and nothing else, but her representative who signed the treaty was the secretary of state for India. But it might arise over Japanese immigration, and I quite agree that if it did arise, as the Senator sugggests, the four self-governing dominions would vote with the United States, however England wanted them to vote.

I do not mean to say that they can not cast independent votes. Of course they can. That is my whole argument. My proposition is that on all questions affecting the Empire they will cast six votes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And my reply to that, Mr. President, is that if the dispute is one to which the Empire or any one of its self-governing members is a party, they can cast no vote, under article 15. Now, there may be a difference in the construction of that article. If there is a difference in the construction, then I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts absolutely that we could meet that by a reservation where there can be no possibility of any misconstruction.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, personally I think there can be but one construction. I think they have the same independent vote there that they would have in the example which the Senator suggested. I can not think their vote can be taken away from them. I do think, admitting that it is doubtful, as the Senator says, that should be covered; but I want to cover them all if I can.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, the vote is taken away from them by the absolute and direct declaration of article 15, which declares that parties to the dispute shall be excluded; and by every process of logic and true reasoning a dispute with a part must be a dispute with the whole, and a dispute with a dominant must be a dispute with each one of its substantive parts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. So that no matter whether you say they have a vote or not, you must say that they have no vote if they are a party to the dispute; and if Great Britain has a dispute, and I can not imagine a single case in which the British Empire as an entity would have a dispute, would be a party to the dispute, which would not include every part of the great British Empire.

I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the proposition stated by the Senator from North Dakota that where there is a dispute the British Empire must speak as a unit is the very proposition which both Mr. Borden and Gen. Smuts rejected, and stated that there might be conditions in which the colonies should have a separate vote, and they intended that the league of nations should be so constructed that they would. Now, when this league of nations gets into operation—if that unfortunate hour should ever occur—suppose that they should put that construction on it. Then what would the Senator from North Dakota do about it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I say they could not put any such construction upon it.

Mr. BORAH. There is no appeal; there is no review; there is no court of review. The Senator would not have any say about it at all. They would be the last to speak upon the subject. What would the Senator do about it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if this league of nations were made up of the British Empire and one other country alone, there is a bare possibility that with the British Empire and its constituent parts having six votes and we having only one, that construction might be adopted by the league; but, Mr. President, no one believes for a single moment that France would give it that construction, that Italy would give it that construction, or that any other of the nations of the world desiring equality would give it any such strained construction as that. Whether they would or not, however, there is no question on earth but that we have the votes in the Senate to give it that construction.

Mr. McCORMICK. In the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. In the Senate, in the matter of a reservation, and a reservation which will become a part of the treaty. We can place that in the reservations in a way that will cure any such inequality, if you concede that the instrument gives any such right.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a single question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator intends, then, to support a reservation which will require the assent of the British Government to its terms before the ratification is effective?

Mr. McCUMBER. I intend, Mr. President, to vote for a reservation which shall declare unequivocally that under the provisions of article 15 a dispute with any part of an empire represented in the assembly is a dispute with the entire empire, and a dispute with a dominant country of the empire is also a dispute with every part of it. I want to make that so clear that there can be no contention, and I do not care what the words are that you use to make it clear.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, this is the point I want to have made perfectly clear, or, rather, ask the Senator from North Dakota to make perfectly clear. The agreement of the British Empire, at present accorded six votes, is necessary to bind it to the interpretation which the Senator would put upon the covenant.

Mr. McCUMBER. Whether the British Government ever agrees to it or not, it does not bind us when we declare we will not be bound. So that disposes of that feature of the case.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that the reservation which the Senator will introduce will take care of the six votes of the British Empire in any controversy in which the British Empire is involved?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose Ecuador and Peru should have a controversy; would the British Empire have six votes to the United States' one vote in the determination of that question?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not say that the British Empire would have six votes.

Mr. WATSON. Not the British Empire, but the English dominions and colonies.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would say that Canada would have a vote separately, cast separately, dictated according to the interests of its own Government, and South Africa would have a vote. They would have a vote on what? I want to get at the dangers which might arise out of that situation. Assuming that they have a vote in a dispute, we will say, between Ecuador and Peru, or in a dispute between Bulgaria and Serbia, what would the vote be on?

Mr. WATSON. I do not know.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will tell you what it would be on.

Mr. WATSON. It would be on whatever was the controversy.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it will not be in the settlement of that dispute; it will not be trying that dispute. It will be in ascertaining what the facts are in that dispute, and publishing those facts to the countries. I have no great fear of any danger in giving Canada that vote, inasmuch as I give Hedjaz a vote, inasmuch as I give a vote to black Haiti, and Liberia, and half a score of other countries that never turned their hands over in this great World War. In other words, I am not afraid of Canada upon a question of finding what the true facts are in a dispute between these countries. That is the real thing and the only thing that Canada or any other country can pass judgment upon in case the dispute is referred to the assembly.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up the other statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I do not know but that he corrected it himself, but he made, in the first instance, the declaration, as I understood him, that in the election of new members to the council, such election could be had by a majority vote of the assembly.

Mr. LODGE. No; new members of the league.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, new members of the league.

Mr. LODGE. Under article 1.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean new members of the league, which new members may have a representation in the council?

Mr. LODGE. I mean only what the treaty says, "new members of the league."

Mr. McCUMBER. We were discussing the only pertinent question to which that could apply, and that was the question whether Canada could get into the council.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understood the Senator's purpose, it was in some way to establish the fact that Canada could have a representation in the council through the action of the assembly in voting new members into the council.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; only in the case of the four members.

Mr. McCUMBER. Even in the case of the four members, that is not true.

Mr. LODGE. I will not argue that now, but I believe that is the case. This is what I was quoting about the assembly—

> Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not question that at all. I agree entirely. But that has nothing to do with the matter of electing members to the council or electing new members who may become members of the council. If Senators will turn to the second paragraph of article 4 they will find that it reads——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me finish this first, and then I will yield. It reads:

> With the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council.

What does that mean? It means simply this, that by a majority vote of the assembly, concurred in by a unanimous vote of the council, they can nominate new members, additional members, who may become members of the council; that is, of the permanent group in the council. In addition to that it says:

> The council with like approval—

That is, the approval of the assembly—

> may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

In every instance the council must act unanimously, because under another provision of the covenant every vote of the council to become effective must be unanimous, except where otherwise specially provided, and this is not one of the cases where it is "otherwise specially provided." I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no question about the accuracy of the last statement of the Senator from North Dakota, but I gathered from the statement which he made just a moment ago that there was some distinction between the admission of new members of the league itself and eligibility to sit in the council. Is it not a fact that when any nation or self-governing colony is once admitted to membership in the league it is eligible to any position in the league?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I think not. That is one of the features I intend to discuss in answering the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I will discuss it with great care.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. I hope the Senator will describe how it is that under this covenant there may eventually come about a state of affairs in which there shall be two classes of membership in the league.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean in the league or in the council?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I mean in the league. My contention is that once a State becomes a member of the league of nations it also becomes eligible to any position in the assembly or the council.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the question we were discussing, and the question that I want to hold to in this discussion, is whether or not there is any way by which you can vote Canada or Australia into the council, in addition to the British Empire, as represented as such, and that I intend to cover.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is the crux of the whole situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. If that proposition is determined in favor of the view that is entertained by the Senator from North Dakota, I concede all the propositions which the Senator from North Dakota undertook to make. But if it should be determined that you can not elect as a member of the council a representative of a dominion or a colony, then I think the Senator will agree that his entire argument must fall with that proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President. Even if that construction were held to be sound, the construction that there was possibility of the power to vote four or five of the British dominions into the council—and you can vote five if you can vote one—it is still akin to an impossibility, because under the vote that would have to be given and under the whole spirit of the instrument, it would never be done. But I am insisting that it can not be done, and I am willing to say that from my construction it can not be done. From the Senator's construction it is almost an impossibility to conceive that the other nations of the world in this league would do what the Senator says is a possibility. I will stand on both propositions.

Mr. BORAH. With all due respect to the Senator, he confuses two propositions. I am debating the proposition now as to whether or not, under the terms of the league, they have a right to be elected to the council. Whether or not they could go out among the members and secure the votes to do it is another proposition entirely. Perhaps Belgium never could secure the votes. Perhaps Serbia never could secure the votes. No one will deny that under the league they have the right to the position if they can secure the votes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not confused in the slightest degree. I deny that that is a fair construction, and what I am saying is that even if you give it that construction, it never would happen. Even if the Senator gives the provision that construction and that Borden gives it that construction, or that Gen. Smuts gives it that construction, I can not give it that construction, and I am going to give my reasons.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I knew the Senator was not going to give it that construction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not, because the Senator has heard me make the statement a great many times; not quite as often as the Senator has stated he would give the opposite construction, but quite often.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to consider some of the statements made by the Senator from Idaho the other day. Two days ago the Senator from Idaho made an address in the Senate in which he sought to combat the arguments and the conclusions which I arrived at, and which I presented on the 6th day of this month, relative to the so-called Johnson amendment. His address was not printed in the RECORD of the proceedings of the day it was given, and I had no opportunity, of course, to answer it immediately after it was delivered.

The Senator not only criticizes my conclusions, but also intimates that my argument is subject to the same claim of unfairness with which I have charged many of the arguments made throughout the country, and sometimes on the floor of the Senate, of those who are opposed to any league of nations whatever.

Mr. President, one of the peculiar characteristics of orators, both real and presumptive, is the tendency to totally disregard facts. Depending more upon their ability to convince by well-constructed and well-delivered sentences, they pay less attention to close analysis than do those who are not so gifted.

If a fact stands in the way of their forensic eloquence, so much the worse for the fact. I admit, Mr. President, that oratory travels more swiftly than truth, but I am certain that truth will travel longer, and upon that I base my hope that in the end the American people will understand the true meaning and the true purpose of the league of nations; not understand it to be perfect, because it is very far from being perfect, in my opinion, but understand that it is a right step in the right direction; and that it is not subject to many and most of the criticisms that are urged against it.

What I have complained of, and what I still condemn, is not that their declarations have been devoid of any semblance of truth but that they persistently avoid presenting the whole truth; that anyone unacquainted with the text of the treaty, listening to their arguments, would draw the conclusion that the council or the assembly had the right to pass final judgment in a dispute between nations; that the council or the assembly would sit as a board of arbitration or as a court to determine and bind nations by its judgments. They never once say to their audiences that by the terms of the treaty, where the nations agreed that they would arbitrate their arbitrable questions, such arbitration is entirely outside of the league, outside of either the council or the assembly. They never mention the fact that by article 13, even in the matter of the agreement to submit arbitrable questions to arbitration, each nation must itself determine whether the subject is suitable for arbitration.

They always forget to tell their audiences that the only thing which each nation agrees to in reference to its disputes is either to submit what it thinks is suitable for arbitration to some arbitrable tribunal to be agreed upon between the nation itself and the disputing nation, and entirely outside of the league of nations, or, if it declines to submit the matter to arbitration at all, that it will allow the council or the assembly to make an inquiry into the facts for the purpose, first, of using its good offices to bring about a settlement by agreement, and if those persuasive efforts fail, then, secondly, to investigate the facts and report such facts to the people of the disputing countries.

They always forget to tell their audiences that the only power that is vested in either the council or the assembly in case of a dispute, and I am considering only disputes, is, first, to endeavor to effect a settlement, and if that fails, second, to make a report containing the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

They fail always to tell their audiences that, even in this matter of ascertaining what the facts are in the case, all disputants are excluded in making such findings. They fail to tell their audiences that in a dispute with the British Empire, the British Empire, with all its votes, is excluded.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. They assume before their audiences that those dominions are never excluded. They do not even admit that anyone construes the instrument as excluding every part of the British Empire where there is a dispute with the British Empire or any of its parts. They assume for granted that there is only the construction that each part has a vote, contrary to the declarations of the President as to the understanding in Europe, contrary to declarations of others, and contrary, according to my construction, to the instrument itself.

I yield to the Senator now, it being on this point, of course.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is on the point to which the Senator was speaking. When he attributes a want of candor to those who differ with him——

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I will not let the Senator say that. I have never stated that there was a want of candor on the part of everyone who disagrees with me.

Mr. McCORMICK. I did not say everyone.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of anyone, so far as that is concerned. I think I understand the treaty; and in our discussions I think, as a rule, we have tried to discuss it fairly with each other, even though we draw different conclusions.

Mr. McCORMICK. But does not the Senator imply——

Mr. McCUMBER. But there are many general bald statements that are made which would carry a wrong impression and a different inference unless explanatory statements were made in relation to it. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator complains that those of us who hold a view very different from his own do not discuss all the provisions and implications of the treaty relative to disputes. There is no one in the Senate who has made a more thorough study of the treaty than the Senator from North Dakota, and yet I have not heard him or any other Senator speak of the relation between two paragraphs found the first in article 5 and the second in article 15. The first, dealing with matters of procedure, provides that the appointment of committees "may be decided by a majority of the members of the league represented at the meeting." Before I touch upon the importance of the committee report I will ask the Senator to turn to article 15:

> If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. McCORMICK. I submit, first, that the aggregate six votes of the British Empire may very well be of great influence in constituting the original committee; that that committee, preparing the case, rendering the decision, will put some party to the controversy in the wrong before the members of the league. I submit further that, even though there be no unanimous and binding report, such as the Senator suggests, having been put in the wrong the members of the league then reserve to themselves the right to take such action as against the power which has been put in the wrong by the committee as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

Mr. McCUMBER. That necessitates my asking the Senator a question. How are the members of the league now to carry out that provision under his construction?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator's question is not quite clear. Does he mean under article 15?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under article 15, which reads——

Mr. McCORMICK. If the council fails to reach a report, the members of the league——

Mr. McCUMBER. Then—

The members of the league reserve to themselves—

It speaks of the members—

the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

I ask the Senator how he thinks the members of the league would proceed to effectuate that purpose under his own construction of that part of the paragraph?

Mr. McCORMICK. I conceive that they would consider themselves authorized to take any steps they saw fit, even as though no covenant of the league existed.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is absolutely right. In other words, it is outside of the league entirely, it is outside of the council, it is outside of the assembly, and the only thing that the several nations can do is to go back to their old status and as nations, not through the instrumentality of the league, but as separate and individual nations, through their own diplomatic channels, attempt to make a settlement outside of the league.

Mr. McCORMICK. But in the meantime, Mr. President, the committee appointed to consider the case, constituted by a majority of the members voting, would have made up the case, and the Senator very well knows how all-important is the case presented to the public opinion of the world. This is not a judicial instrument; it is a political instrument.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is not holding to one particular ground very well, because his first statement was based upon what would be done and how I would construe the last portion of this part of article 15 in case there was no settlement, in case they did not arrive at any conclusion. I stated that it meant exactly what it said, that then the whole question would have to hark back to the separate nations themselves. The Senator now asks about the matter of a board or a committee being appointed and of allowing Canada—that is naturally what he means—and Australia a voice in determining who this committee or subcommittee might be. Of course, if it is in the council, there would probably be no subcommittee, because it is a small body. In the assembly there would undoubtedly be appointed a committee, and in the appointment of that committee there would be no question that Canada and Australia would have a vote. In the appointment of a committee to find a fact they would have a vote.

Mr. McCORMICK. Or to render an opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. To render an opinion is to render an opinion upon the facts. That is finding a fact of what the dispute is.

The Senator assumes that by an action of this kind Canada and Australia pack the jury. Well, Mr. President, I do not think so. I accord a greater degree of national honor than that to every one of these nations. I am not afraid of anyone packing a jury against the United States in the appointment of a little committee which is to determine a fact. I agree with the Senator that they would have a vote; and that matter, which would be a matter of procedure only, would not require a unanimous vote. So there is but little disagreement upon that point. I have not any fear of it.

Now, Mr. President, I come right back to the arguments of which I complain—not arguments made in the Senate; I do not mean that; but arguments made before audiences over the United States. If the orators I have in mind would present the whole case to their audiences, there would be an entirely different conclusion drawn as to any great danger or injustice to the United States by allowing Canada and Australia each to have a vote with the United States in determining what are the true facts in a dispute between Bulgaria and Roumania or any other countries outside of the British Empire. The American public, knowing the respect for law and truth which are inherent in the Australian and Canadian character, would have no fear of a finding of fact by the representatives of either of those countries being contrary to the evidence in the case.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] pays a high tribute to Canada, and says that he wants Canada to remain in the league of nations. If he wants Canada and Australia and South Africa to remain members of the league, it is because he has confidence in them; and I, Mr. President, have the same confidence.

It is the failure to present the whole truth concerning the treaty and presenting the half truth in such a way as to mislead of which I complain. My criticism of that course every Senator knows to be well founded. I may be in error in the matter of construing the meaning of any phrase or sentence of the treaty, but I do try my best to ascertain the true meaning of the treaty, its full application and limitations.

Mr. President, I shall proceed to reply to some of the broad declarations of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. As to the right of Canada to claim representation in the council, he says—and I quote his words:

In the first place, upon what theory can it be argued that the Dominions can not have representation in the council? Is there any provision in the league covenant which inhibits it?

I answer, without hesitation, "Yes; there is." Again he says:

Is there any clause or phrase in the covenant itself which says that Canada, if she can secure the votes, is not entitled to representation on the council, just as any other nation may become a member of the council if she can secure the votes?

I reply again, "Yes; both in the words and in the whole spirit of the covenant." Again, he says:

Is there any obstacle to Canada becoming a member of the council that does not exist with reference to every other signer of the treaty?

Again, I reply, "By both the spirit and by the wording of the instrument, there is such an obstacle." Again, he says:

Is there any obstacle to Australia becoming a member of the council, if she can secure the votes, any more than in the case of Belgium?

And, again, I answer, "Yes; there is."

I refer now to the very article creating the council, article 4, calling attention before reading it to the fact that it is not members themselves that constitute the council. In all the arguments that we hear we confuse members with representatives. It is not the members but the representatives of certain members that constitute the council. It would be just as improper to say that the Senate is composed of New York and Pennsylvania and other States, naming them, as it is to say that the council is composed of the United States, the British Empire, and other nations, enumerating them; second, that the council is made up of the two groups of representatives, one permanent and the other temporary.

Now, I want to read article 4. It reads thus:

The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers—

And, of course, those are the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan—together with representatives of four other—

Now, I want to call attention to the word "other"— four other members of the league.

The representatives of the five mentioned powers are permanent. The last paragraph of article 4 reads—and I again call attention to this:

At the meetings of the council each member represented on the council shall have one vote, and may have not more than one representative.

Remember, it does not say that each representative upon the council shall have one vote, but it says that each member represented on the council shall have one vote through that representative. That means that the British Empire represented in the council shall have one vote through a representative, and does not mean anything else. That is not all.

Now, remember that it is not Great Britain but the British Empire, which includes Great Britain and Scotland and Ireland and every domain of the British Empire, that is represented. It is claimed, because Canada and Australia have each been given a separate vote, an independent status in the assembly, that would entitle them to enjoy such separate entity and have a separate representative in the council, but the granting of a separate vote in the assembly does not change the eternal and everlasting fact that Canada is a part of the British Empire, and it is the British Empire as an entity alone that is represented in the council.

If this treaty should become the law of the land, a binding obligation between nations, and the British Empire should say, "The fact that this Empire is given permanent representation in the permanent group does not prevent, if there are enough votes to place me there, my right also to be a member of the temporary group," would anyone for a single moment concede that she could claim any such right? Would not everyone insist that this is not only against the spirit of the instrument but contrary to the wording which, after enumerating the permanent group, continues—together with the representatives of four other members of the league.

That means members other than the British Empire. The words "other members of the league" mean that they must be members other than the whole as well as other than any part of the British Empire. If you can include Canada, you can, of course, include all the other British dominions, and you could put two of the British Empire on the permanent list and still have four more places on the temporary list that could be filled by the British colonies, making it entirely a British council. I think that is an unreasonable construction; that it is against the whole spirit and intendment of the league of nations. Would not everyone insist that that would be not only against the spirit of the instrument but contrary to its wording? The words "other members" do not mean anything else than members other than the British Empire, after enumerating the British Empire.

I insist that not only by the spirit but by the terms of article 4 Great Britain can not divide herself so that she can keep her head in the permanent group and her feet in the temporary group and claim a separate vote for both the head and the feet in the council. If the Senator from Idaho thinks she can do this, if he thinks that it is not inconsistent with both the spirit and the words of article 4, then all I can say is that I most emphatically disagree with him.

But, Mr. President, I have been willing to concede his right and the right of other Senators to claim a construction of that character if they think that it is not violative of the clear terms and of the unquestioned intention of article 4. But I have insisted that even if there was a possibility that any nation on earth would claim such a right in this body, limited to nine members, it would still be equivalent to an impossibility, because it would be impossible to conceive that every one of these representatives on the council would be willing to vote to allow Canada, Australia, or other British dominion membership in the council in addition to the British Empire as a whole, and I do not think that anyone can by any possibility construe, or rather misconstrue, the instrument in such a way as would allow this to be done except by a unanimous vote.

The Senator from Idaho says, referring to my argument:

But while the Senator was denouncing those who were opposing this provision in the covenant for misrepresentation, he left out of his review an entire paragraph which covered the subject he was dealing with, and which permitted the addition of four or five members to the council.

And then he calls attention to article 4, paragraph 1.

But, Mr. President, this is the very paragraph that I have been considering. It is the very paragraph which I declare neither in spirit nor in terms allows both the Empire as a whole and the constituent parts to be represented in the council. But even here the Senator from Idaho has inadvertently, or with that degree of carelessness which so often becomes the characteristic of the orator, used words in reference to this paragraph that are not at all applicable to that paragraph, when he says:

Which—

Referring to this paragraph—permitted the addition of four or five members to the council.

This paragraph does not admit any added number of members to the council. It simply says that—

These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion.

That means the four already included in the temporary class, which four may from time to time be changed by the assembly. It does not mean an addition of 4 or 5, making 13 or 14 States represented.

The paragraph relating to added members is the second paragraph, and not the one quoted; and it is this paragraph which, I insist, can not by any possibility be construed to allow the inclusion of representatives from Canada, because this paragraph reads:

With the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council.

And—

The council with like approval may increase the members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

That is the provision relating to added members of the league, which members may become members of the council.

I have tried to call attention to the fact that when this paragraph says "the council may name additional members of the league," it necessarily must mean members in addition to those who are now members of the league. Otherwise, you would not have the word "additional." You would have simply declared, "The council may name members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council." If it had so read, then there would be some ground for contention that Canada might be selected under this second paragraph.

Labor as earnestly as you are capable of doing, you can not make this word "additional" relate to anything but members of the league; and in the second clause of that second paragraph we have exactly the same thing. It reads:

The council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league.

Instead of saying "may add to the membership," it says "may increase the number of members of the league." You can not increase the number of members of the league except by adding to the number those which at present are outside the number included. And, Mr. President, inasmuch as all these dominions are at present included as members of the league, you can not add them to the members of the league. You can not increase the number of members of the league by adding those which are already members, and under this second paragraph it is only these added members that can be selected for representation either in the permanent or in the temporary group of representatives constituting the council.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another declaration of the Senator from Idaho relating to my argument, in which he says:

I thought I could detect an inconsistency in the able Senator's argument, because with great effect he argued that these separate colonies had made such sacrifices in the war that it was nothing less than a wrong for us to deny them all the rights of other members of the league. But he finally concluded his argument by saying that the sacrifices which they made, the loss of their men, the fight which they made for the civilization of the world, will be satisfied by a position in an assembly without power, and where they can do nothing but debate.

Mr. President, I have never used words purporting anything of the kind, either in the Senate or out of the Senate. I have never for once questioned that Canada and Australia and all of these other British dominions have the same right to vote that any other country would have under the like condition. All I have claimed is, first, that they can not vote—and, if Senators think they can, that we ought to make it clear that they can not vote—where the British Empire or any of its constituent parts are parties to the dispute; and, secondly, that the only thing that is ever to be submitted either to the council or to the assembly in relation to disputes is the determination of what constitutes the disputes, and also, in addition to that, what recommendation should be made. Upon that, and where neither Great Britain nor Canada nor any of the parts of the British Empire were parties to the disputes, of course, Canada or Australia would have the same vote as any other member. I have never claimed that this was merely a debating society. I admit that possibly a great deal of it will be such, but the right to determine the facts is clearly given in the instrument itself.

Mr. President, I do not care about going over this ground any further. I think I have made my position clear as to what can be determined in the council and in the assembly. I am certain that there is no power to arbitrate given to either the council or the assembly. There is no power to pass judgment. There is a power and a right and a duty, when a dispute comes before either of these bodies, first to attempt to settle it. The first duty of either the council or the assembly, when a dispute reaches either of those bodies, is to attempt to secure an agreement between the parties.

If they fail in that persuasive endeavor, then the next and the only step they can take is to investigate and report the facts and make a recommendation upon those facts. If those things do not bring about a settlement, then the provision is that the matter must go back to the individual members outside of the league, and they agree to use their own best endeavors to bring about a settlement; and, in addition to that, my own insistence is that where a member of the British Empire is a party to the dispute it takes in the entire Empire.

I admit that Senators may justly disagree with me upon that; and they claim that Mr. Borden disagrees with me upon that, and that the letter of Mr. Wilson and Clemenceau and Lloyd-George is in disagreement. I have referred to that before. While I do not claim to know everything that preceded this letter, and what the argument was, I simply say that the letter does not say any such thing; that is all. All the letter says is that—

We concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article—representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council.

It does not say that they may be selected in addition to other representatives from any part of the British Empire.

It may be, as has been suggested, that there is something back of this in previous declarations and correspondence which would justify the conclusion that that was what was intended, and that this letter therefore meant that Canada could have a representative independent of Great Britain. All I can say in answer to that is that it is contrary both to the spirit and to the letter of the agreement in reference to representation upon the council, and the single vote of the British Empire, equal only to that of France and the United States and Japan and Italy, as members whose representatives are entitled to vote in the council.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know that much is to be gained, if anything, by continuing the discussion with the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. He has repeated the argument which he made some days ago, to which I attempted to make reply, and has not, as I view his presentation, either modified his position or added anything in support of his contention heretofore made. I desire, however, to refer very briefly to what I consider the most important feature of the argument of the able Senator, and that is as to whether the colonies and dominions can become members of the council.

So far as I know, the Senator from North Dakota is the only one now contending that they can not become members of the council. The position was taken at one time by other Members of the Senate, and perhaps by advocates throughout the country, that they could not become members of the council under the terms of the covenant; but after the letter published over the signatures of the President, Mr. Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George, and after the statement by Mr. Borden and Gen. Smuts, and upon further investigation, so far as I know, it is no longer contended that the representatives of the dominions may not become members of the council. They fall back upon the proposition that it would be impracticable for them to secure the votes to do so. But with that, Mr. President, we have very little to do, because all that rests in the future, and depends upon combinations and conditions which we can not very well foresee or forecast. I am only concerned, Mr. President, with the question whether, according to the letter of the covenant itself, they have a right to be members of the council, in case they can secure the votes, as other nations can become members of the council; and, as I said, so far as I know, the Senator from North Dakota is the only one now contending that the covenant prohibits them from becoming members of the council.

Before I take up that particular question, however, may I say a word with reference to the suggestion of the Senator that I seemed to call in question his motives in advocating a league; and what I say applies to all others advocating a league. The question of motives here does not come within the domain of debate. It is a subject which I do not discuss. I question no colleague's motives in the discharge of his duties here. Whatever I may think about it, it is not a subject for debate. Men may do very wise things from very bad motives and very unwise things from very good motives. It is the effect of the act and the contention with which we are concerned here and which is a matter of legitimate debate, and that alone concerns us in the discussions here. So if anything has been said upon my part either with reference to the Senator from North Dakota or any other Senator which would seem to imply a challenge of any man's motives in pursuing this or that course or supporting this or that proposition it is aside from any intention of mine to have it so construed. As to the effect of a vote which may be cast or a contention which is made and as to whether that is in harmony with what I conceive to be the best interests of the country, that is a subject of legitimate debate and may be a subject of very intense conviction.

There is a wide disparity between the opponents of this amendment. The Senator from North Dakota in opening his remarks a few days ago stated that he proposed to show two things: First, that this amendment was unnecessary in order to protect the equality of power or influence of the United States in the league, and, secondly, that if it were adopted it would be a grave injustice to the dominions and colonies of Great Britain by reason of the position which they had occupied in the war and the sacrifices which they had sustained. On the other hand, during the last two days of the debate it has been contended with great earnestness that the amendment does not effectuate any change at all, as it were; that it does not accomplish the shearing of power from the dominions.

Mr. President, I do not think this amendment accomplishes by any means a full equality of power and influence, but it goes further and effectuates more than any other proposition which has been submitted to me or which has come under my observation, and, so far as I am concerned, I desire to vote for an amendment which will go as far as an amendment may, and then I shall vote for the reservation if upon final reflection I conclude that the reservation accomplishes more along a different line or in any way adds to our strength in the league.

But I call the attention now of those who are advocating a reservation to what I conceive to be the distinction, and which with all due respect to those who are advocating it seems to me is not founded upon so solid a basis as the amendment. As I understand the reservation, whatever it accomplishes it accomplishes by eliminating the dominions from a vote in the assembly or wherever they may be found in the league. In other words, we reduce the British Empire, under the reservation, in case we are dissatisfied with any decision, to a unit, and will not hold ourselves down by any action which may be taken wherein more than one vote was cast by the British Empire. That has the effect of eliminating the dominions entirely.

I do not object at all, and never have objected, to the dominions having their vote in the league, provided that it can be equalized by the vote or the influence, the prestige or power, by reason of the vote, of the United States. I think that the dominions, owing to the peculiar construction of the British Empire, may well contend for that which they have contended for and are entitled to much consideration in regard to that. But, Mr. President, if the amendment should be defeated and the plan to add additional votes and power to the United States should fail, the next best alternative undoubtedly, so far as our interests are concerned, is to shear away the power of the British Empire and deprive her of the votes of her colonies in these emergencies.

Mr. President, this entire question can be simplified and better understood if we will realize the dual capacity which the dominions occupy in this scheme of a world league. In the first place, as dominions of the British Empire, they are bound to the British Empire, and are under certain obligations and sustain a certain relationship to the British Empire, which deprives them of their sovereignty, of their nationhood. They are at most qualified nations or qualified sovereigns. They are not complete, independent entities, so far as the British Empire is concerned. But for the purpose of organizing the league of nations they take an entirely different position. While they are dominions in the British Empire they are separate and independent nations in the league of nations; and they occupy the positions therefore of complete, dual entities, as it were, one being circumstanced and conditioned by reason of the relations to the British Empire and the other a wholly different proposition, by reason of the attitude which they assume in the league.

I call attention to Mr. Borden's statement, which makes that very plain. I referred to a portion of this the other day, but not to this particular paragraph. He said:

> Each nation must preserve unimpaired its absolute autonomy, but it must likewise have its voice as to those external relations which involve the issue of peace or of war. So that the Britannic Commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded on the 28th of last June.

Whatever may be her attitude toward the British league, they would not permit it to be left in doubt as to what their position should be in the league of nations.

Can the dominions become members of the council? There is nothing in the league of nations which inhibits their being members of the council. They can be elected if they can find the votes, just the same as any other power. As the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] stated a few minutes ago, they have signed the league, they have signed the treaty, and they stand in just the same position, having all the rights and privileges under the league as any other nation.

Suppose Canada was a candidate for membership in the council. What clause would you draw upon her? What provision of the league would you present to her which would say to Canada, "You can not be a candidate; you are ineligible"? What phrase or paragraph can you point to that would fix her ineligibility? You might say to her, "I will not vote for you, notwithstanding your right to be elected." But you might say that to Belgium or Serbia or any other country. But what clause would the Senator from North Dakota point to in the league and say, "You are not eligible at all to membership here, and therefore can not be a candidate; I could not vote for you if I wanted to"? There is no such clause. Canada could well say, "I stand in precisely the same position as the United States or Serbia or Belgium or Greece or Brazil or any other country. Why should I be excluded from the council?"

Then you would have to reply, "For no other reason in the world than that we think it would be unwise for you to be there, not because the covenant prohibits it."

Mind you, before we say that, before we shall have declared to Canada that we think she ought not to be a member, we have signed the league which gives her the right to be a member.

So, Mr. President, I do not think it can be contended that, so far as the terms of the covenant are concerned, it can be said that Australia or New Zealand or Canada are ineligible as candidates.

What does Gen. Smuts say about that? He makes it very plain, and Gen. Smuts is one of the great outstanding figures of this war, not only a man of transcendent ability but he has disclosed more independence of thought and more courage, I will not say that any man who was at Versailles—but it was so pronounced that it was commented on throughout the world. Everyone will remember the speech which Gen. Smuts made in England before he left for South Africa, in which he told the English people that they had to settle the Irish question, that they had to settle their internal matters, and that the quicker they did so the sooner the British Empire would be at ease and enjoy the tranquillity which she was entitled to enjoy.

So upon every occasion and under all circumstances he has never hesitated to say what was in his mind with the utmost freedom. Everyone will remember that when he left Versailles the declaration which he made to the world required some courage to make under the circumstances, when he said—I am not quoting his exact language, but the substance—that the aspirations of the human family, the things which had nerved the people of the world to pay out their money and shed their blood without stint were not written in this treaty. So he has spoken upon all occasions and under all circumstances as a man who was giving utterance to the things which he believed to be true. He said:

> Regarding the league of nations, it was incorrect to say that in the league the British Empire was a unit. The empire was a group, but South Africa had exactly the same rights and voice as England. Though England was a permanent member of the central council, South Africa could be elected to that council.

That is the understanding of Gen. Smuts, who was there. Aye, indeed, that is the understanding of the man who framed the first league of nations, upon which this league was built. That is the position which is occupied by Borden. I am not going to take time to reread it. I read it into my remarks the other day. But Mr. Borden contended from the very beginning that the dominions should occupy a place in the league which will enable them to enjoy all the rights of the league, notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain might, as a unit, be holding a position in the league, in the council, or elsewhere.

Now, having the views of those two men, who are in a position to know, let us look again at this letter which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] refines away:

> The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council.

Not representatives from the dominions for the British Empire, but representatives of the dominions, may be selected as members upon the council. The Senator from North Dakota would have us believe that Borden and Smuts set about to secure a construction which would enable Great Britain, if she chose to do so, or the British Empire, to select the permanent membership from some of the dominions, but representing all the time the British Empire. Can anyone think that they deemed it necessary to have a construction which would permit Great Britain to select her representatives from any part of her dominions from which she chose to select them? That was not the contention. The contention was that, notwithstanding the British Empire had its member upon the council, the dominions, in addition to that membership, should have a position upon the council, and that was the construction which was placed upon it by Borden and Smuts, and it is the construction of this letter:

> We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view.

That is the view entertained by Borden, which is made clear by his statement published a short time ago and now in the RECORD, to wit, that the dominions have a separate entity.

> If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow and technical construction.

All parties, therefore, who are in position to know what the intent of the framers was have construed this in accordance with the proposition that the dominions may have members of the council, and when we take into consideration that they are full members of the league, that they stand there as separate signers of the league, that there is no inhibition in the league against their being members of the council, that there is no curtailment of their privileges in the league, it seems to me that there can no longer be any contention that they may be members of the council and have a right to be the same as anyone else.

Mr. President, this question of whether or not the dominions could become members of the council is very important. It is one of those matters which might be easily settled if there were any doubt about it left in the minds of anyone. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is in touch with the League to Enforce Peace, and the League to Enforce Peace are in touch with the British authorities as to their construction of this league, and they are in confidential communication with them from day to day, and I have some telegrams in my possession which show that. If it were thought advisable, it seems to me that the view of the leading authorities in England upon this question might be had. I venture to say that you will not find the premier of England, or any of those who represent the Government, admitting for a moment that the dominions may not be members of the council. If the information could not be secured in that way the construction or contention of the British authorities could be secured through diplomatic channels. It is a thing which need not be left in doubt. If the authorities of Great Britain are willing to concede the contention of such able gentlemen as the Senator from North Dakota, that can be known; but in view of the fact that Mr. Borden says the premier led the fight for the contention which he made, and that he has placed his construction upon that contention, and that Gen. Smuts, who assisted him in making the fight, has placed his construction upon it, until we hear further from those authorities we must conclude that that is the contention which they are going to make within the league. If they make that contention and secure that construction, what possible remedy have we? There is no appeal from the decisions which these powers shall make. There is no one to construe it after they have construed it. The league construes its own powers and augments and increases or diminishes its powers as it may see fit, and no one can challenge it and no one can correct it.

The only remedy that can possibly be had is a remedy that is had before we enter the league. Therefore these amendments and these reservations which are placing constructions upon the covenant, which are to go in and constitute and form a part of the covenant, and therefore be binding.

But, however able may be the Senator from North Dakota, he would have to admit that if there is nothing found in the way of a construction except his speech, if his speech is not reduced to an amendment or a reservation, little attention will be given to it when the league convenes in Geneva. Here, with 32 different nations ratifying this league, all of them construing it in different ways, there is no safety in construction except to reduce it to a clause and put it in the covenant itself where it will have effect.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I will not delay even for 10 minutes the action of the Senate on the pending amendment. I have been ready and extremely anxious to vote on this and every other provision of the treaty and covenant for a long time. I am not complaining because other Senators have spoken long and frequently on this most important international agreement. I have listened with most profound interest to much of what has been said, and I have no patience with those people who have practically advised the Senate to sign in blank what the President has presented to the Senate, which is one of the two coordinate branches of the treaty-making powers of the Government. I am confident that study and discussion has enlightened public sentiment, and that through proper reservations our country is going to be saved from some of the imminently possible dangers which indifference, carelessness, and inability allowed to be inserted in the treaty and attached covenant. Some day the people of the United States will realize the truth of this statement. Every honest, intelligent man understands that the preceding document is almost hopelessly, if not wickedly, involved in doubt. It has been almost impossible to determine its meaning and its possible results. I have had grave doubts which I have conscientiously endeavored to solve; but when I have not succeeded in making the provisions clear to my mind, I have resolved the doubt in favor of our country.

For many years I have felt it was our duty to take a prominent part in securing cooperation with other nations of the world to prevent unjust war and to preserve a righteous peace. I had fondly hoped that at the end of this awful war the great opportunity for such cooperation would be improved. That opportunity has been lost to a large degree by this abortive agreement which is before us. The President has been overreached by the Allies, who knew and obtained what they wanted. The interests and welfare of the United States seem to have been overlooked or disregarded. It is now more than ordinarily the duty of the Senate to secure as far as possible such rights and welfare.

I do not believe that we should reject the treaty or render inoperative anything that is good and desirable in the covenant. The latter does at least furnish some opportunity for a workable understanding looking to the preservation of peace, and it does contain some things which should be retained.

I have quite consistently voted against amendments to the treaty for reasons which I have heretofore given and which I will not now repeat.

The pending amendment is, in my judgment, different in principle and effect from the others. It is largely sentimental; but, sir, it is the sentiment of patriotism and national respect, and I will not allow any occasion to pass without expressing my disapproval of any suggestion, even, certainly not of any international recognition, that the United States, which so unselfishly and so effectively sacrificed its boys and treasure in the war, is of less importance than any other nation in the world. The league covenant does contemptibly recognize such inferiority.

The pending amendment does not entirely place our country in the position I would like to have it occupy. It does, however, resent the insult which the covenant implies and it announces the doctrine which the world accepts, viz, that the United States is second to no nation on earth. Other nations have the same rights to equality as have the British Empire and the United States. If they are content with the position as to voting power in which the covenant places them, I probably would have little cause to complain. It is my solemn duty here and now to defend my country against slight and danger, and this I propose to perform by voting on this and every other occasion for any pertinent measure which recognizes the equality of this Republic among the nations.

Who can object to this? Will the little democracies, who recognize the United States as their hope and salvation and for whom the friends of a league are so solicitous? Evidently not. Will the British Empire? No. But if she does, will she not thereby acknowledge that she desires to retain an advantage to which she is not entitled and which may be injurious if not disastrous to our country? But as for myself, sir, while I am somewhat indifferent to what other nations may think about this matter, I am deeply interested in what the people of the United States may think, and I must have the approval of my own conscience.

I regret more than I can tell that so much harsh, intemperate criticism has been indulged against some of our associates in this war. They rendered invaluable service in saving civilization. They have, as it was their national duty to do, looked after the welfare of their own countries. I feel that our welfare and, in this particular case our honor, have been neglected. I shall do what I can to correct that wrong and at the same time to preserve whatever is good in the covenant as the beginning, at least, of our effort to establish peace and righteousness in the world.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that we may vote upon the pending amendments before adjournment or recess to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hale	McNary	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Harding	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Harris	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Harrison	New	Spencer
Colt	Henderson	Newberry	Sterling
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Dial	Kellogg	Owen	Trammell
Edge	Keyes	Penrose	Wadsworth
Fernald	King	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Kirby	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
France	Knox	Robinson	Watson
Gay	La Follette	Sheppard
Gerry	Lenroot	Shields
Gore	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are detained by illness in their families. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to vote upon the two pending amendments before recess or adjournment to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I object. The reason why I object is because the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has telephoned that he desires to be heard upon this amendment, that he is sick and unable to be here, and I insist that he shall have an opportunity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I then ask unanimous consent that not later than the adjournment or recess on the calendar day of Monday next the Senate proceed to vote upon the pending amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator state the request again?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In view of the objection made by the Senator from California, I amend my request and ask unanimous consent that the Senate agree to vote upon the so-called Johnson amendments, which have been pending for about a week, not later than the close of the session on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, being uncertain as to the number of Senators who may desire to be heard upon the question, I should be very glad to enter into that unanimous-consent agreement, so far as personally I could, if it were fixed for Tuesday. I have been told that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LAFOLLETTE] desires to speak upon the subject. I am not entirely clear as to his wishes. I know that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] desires to speak at length. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] has told me that he desires to speak. I think they ought to be accorded the opportunity. Will not Tuesday be satisfactory?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have made the unanimous-consent request, and I ask to have it put. If some one objects——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I object, then, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, I ask that not later than the close of the calendar day of Tuesday the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suppose the Senator desires to call attention to the fact that the Senate is to receive the King of the Belgians on Tuesday.

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator is no doubt a mind reader, but that was not my purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had that in mind, and I supposed possibly the Senator was about to mention it. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. My purpose was to suggest that when we agree on a time to vote, which I hope we shall do, we fix a definite hour, 5 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator mean by that that we might vote on any other day not later than 5 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. That we vote on this amendment—that is all that is asked for—not later than 5 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will make that request, then, that the Senate give unanimous consent that a vote shall be taken upon the pending amendments, the so-called Johnson amendments——

Mr. WATSON. And any amendments thereto. There are some amendments, I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I would include that—on Tuesday, not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, that being the suggestion I made a moment ago, I am very glad to accede to it so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. LODGE. I hope it will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the agreement as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senate will vote upon what are known as the Johnson amendments, and any amendments thereto, to the treaty of peace with Germany, page 19, after line 17, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, October 28, 1919.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the agreement as proposed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that that includes both the amendments that are connected with each other. One is known as the Johnson amendment, and the other as the Moses amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the agreement that is proposed, so that there may be no misunderstanding in regard to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary in this same connection, but I propose to offer an amendment, similar in nature to those that have been discussed, to section 5; and I will offer it now if the Senator from Nebraska prefers, so that he may understand what it is, and, if he desires, include it in his request for a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that would hardly be in order. The Senate has already agreed by unanimous consent to vote first of all upon the committee amendments, of which these two constitute a part; and, as I understand, the Senator's amendment is a personal amendment which is entirely separate from these, although it may have a similar purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is practically the same.

Mr. LODGE. And it will be in order after voting on the committee amendments.

Mr. SHIELDS. It relates to the same article.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It will be in order, then, after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The committee amendments can be amended, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Tuesday, October 28, 1919, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will vote upon the amendment known as the Johnson amendment and the amendment known as the Moses amendment to the treaty of peace with Germany, and on any amendment that may be offered to either.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, from statements that have already been made as to the Senators who propose to speak upon this amendment, I am quite sure that it is proposed to fix a date entirely too early. I desire to make a speech myself upon this amendment, and I object to the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I renew the request, but asking to have the vote taken Wednesday, at not later than 5 o'clock. I ask to have that submitted.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

That on the calendar day of Wednesday, October 29, 1919, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon what are known as the Johnson and Moses amendments proposed to the treaty of peace with Germany, and upon any amendments that may be offered to either; and will dispose of the said amendments before adjournment on the said calendar day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to have an opportunity to speak upon the pending amendments. It has been my experience and observation that as soon as the bar of unanimous consent is put up on further debate it immediately creates a desire to be heard upon the part of quite a large number of Senators who had theretofore not intended to participate in the debate upon the question. I am apprehensive that in violation of our standing rule a list will be made at the desk for recognition, in conformity with a practice that has come to be quite uniform on occasions such as this, where the debate is limited; and unless one is fortunate enough to get his name on the list early, he is likely to be excluded from being heard at all. While I suppose that the debate upon these pending amendments might easily be concluded before the time asked to be fixed, I wish to speak especially, Mr. President, to the labor provisions of the treaty while this amendment is pending, because those provisions are profoundly affected by the discrepancy in the voting strength and the voting power of this country and Great Britain, and therefore all that I have to say is very pertinent to the pending amendment, though I also expect to broadly discuss the effect of these labor provisions.

Under the circumstances, I hope that the Senator from Nebraska will not press for unanimous consent to conclude the debate upon the pending amendments. I was in hopes that I might speak this afternoon, but I find now that it is impossible for me to get from the typewriter the notes which I have made for this discussion, and I am constrained, Mr. President, to object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator objects, I would like to have an opportunity to amend my request so that I might meet his objection. I would add to the request made for voting on Wednesday a clause that beginning on the calendar day of Tuesday no Senator speak more than one hour. That will give everybody a chance, and the Senator from Wisconsin can be recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would not quite enable me to complete my address. I have exactly 59 pages of manuscript upon this subject, and it will take me two hours and a half, I think, to finish the address.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I will amend it so as to except the Senator from Wisconsin, who shall be allowed three hours. We are all very anxious to hear the Senator, I am sure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will not consent to any arrangement that designates me by name in its terms. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I regret that the Senate did not agree to fix a time. I am inclined to think that if we put off voting on these amendments as long as Wednesday it will be put off much longer than necessary. As we have not been able to reach a unanimous-consent agreement, I only desire now to say that I shall move a recess this afternoon until Monday, and I shall endeavor to hold the Senate in session as long as Senators will stay here with me.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to offer an amendment to article 4 of the treaty. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is short, and I will ask that the Secretary may read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment proposed to article 4 of the treaty with Germany, to follow the same and constitute a part of that article.

Provided further, That when imperial and federal governments and their self-governing dominions, colonies, or states are members of the league, as originally organized or hereafter admitted, the empire or federal government and the dominions, colonies, or states shall, collectively, have only one membership, one delegate, and one vote in the council, and only three delegates and one vote in the assembly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that the amendment be printed with the other reservations and amendments for the use of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, no Member of the Senate regrets our inability to reach an agreement for a final vote upon these amendments more earnestly than myself. Had we been able to do so, I would cheerfully forego any discussion of these amendments. But in view of the objections just interposed, I shall occupy your attention for a brief period regarding them.

Mr. President, I have not been able to attribute to the representation provided in the structure of Part I of the treaty the importance which it seems to occupy in the minds of many Senators. I have discovered in my examination of the covenant several serious and one or two apparently insoluble obstacles to its acceptance. It may be that I have attributed too much importance to other parts of the treaty, and thus made the mistake that seems to me to have been made by others concerning the subject matter of these amendments.

I am not aware that when this particular feature of the covenant of the league was under consideration at Paris objection from any source was expressed against the arrangement. Some time last February we received the original draft of the proposed covenant, at which time many criticisms were made of it, but I do not recall this objection was one of them. I heard a number of very able criticisms of that draft on the floor of this body; I read many strong magazine and newspaper articles in adverse comment upon it; I received a great many personal communications concerning it. I do not remember that in any of these discussions, articles, or communications was objection made, much less elaborated, against the preponderant power of the British Empire in the counsels of the league. Of course, Mr. President, that circumstance, if properly stated, is no argument for or against the proposition, but it indicates, if true, that its importance has since that time been largely exaggerated.

I do not for a moment question the soundness of the proposition that in all matters of dispute or of difference which may arise hereafter, and coming within the jurisdiction of the league, which concern the United States directly, no member of the assembly should have a preponderant vote or influence as compared with any other. I do not believe that anyone will successfully challenge the soundness of that proposition, which seems self-evident. Moreover, that is the only rule which squares with fairness and justice. So far, then, as that feature of the amendment is concerned, I am in hearty sympathy with it. I think there is and can be no doubt that every delegate to the assembly representing a member of the league has the same power and authority, the same eligibility to a seat in the council, and the same attributes which are common to every other member.

It makes no difference whether this delegate represents a colony, a dependency, or an independent sovereign power. The equilibrium is destroyed the moment any difference in authority or eligibility is recognized. In my judgment, delegates to the assembly representing India or either of the four self-governing dominions of the British Empire, or all of them together, if you please, are entirely qualified for membership in the council.

While I have the highest regard for the opinion of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I am unable to accept his reasoning upon this subject. But, Mr. President, the question is largely an academic one, for the reason that unanimity of action on the part of the members composing the council is absolutely essential to their election to the council, as it is to the election of a representative of any other nation to that body. In other words, from a practical view of the situation, there is no possibility of the selection of such a delegate to the council, for the very good reason that Italy, France, and, in all probability, Japan, would be quite as much concerned in preventing an undue preponderance in the council in favor of any nation as would be the United States. But, if the fact were otherwise, the interposition of a single objecting vote precludes the possibility of the addition of such a member to the council or the selection of such a member in place of a nation now represented upon it. So we are spending much time in discussing a situation which, from a practical point of view, seems to be wholly negligible.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a day or two ago occupied some time in establishing, from the Borden correspondence and from other sources of information, the complete independence of the representatives of all of the self-governing dominions as members of the council. I think his argument, while perfect, proved too much, for, assuming such a complete independence, it must follow that they can only be subservient to the British Empire through motives of friendship, or because of an interest which is quite as likely to manifest itself in any other representative. They are either independent of Great Britain or they are not. If they are independent, then their adhesion to the cause of the Empire in times of crisis is determined, not upon the element of dependence, but upon identity of interest or of understanding or of amity or of any of the other influences which might be equally controlling with any other member of the league.

No man contends, Mr. President, no man can contend successfully, that there is or should be any difference whatever in the assembly between the status of representatives of self-governing dominions and that of representatives of any other country. If I am right, then the question of influence or of preponderant power operating as a menace to the people of the United States, in my judgment, disappears.

I have stated these conclusions, Mr. President, somewhat clumsily, perhaps inaccurately, but they are to me convincing of the comparative unimportance of the objection except in so far as the contingency might materialize against the United States in some difficulty or dispute directly between ourselves and Great Britain or some sovereignty with which that Empire had very close treaty relations.

I listened with much pleasure and instruction to the address of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] upon these amendments a few days ago. He contended that, conceding to the Johnson amendment all the need for it that its author claimed, it did not accomplish the purpose which he had in mind, did not invest the United States with five additional votes, and did not create that equilibrium of conditions which, of course, is the object of the amendment. I have never listened to a clearer, more logical, and convincing presentation of a proposition in my life. He elaborated the subject, and so much better than I can, that I perhaps should apologize for discussing the subject at all. He demonstrated, with the precision of a problem in Euclid, the impossibility of meeting the real objection, which we must consider, by the adoption of anything less than a reservation directly aimed at the difficulty, such, for example, as presented by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] or that which was presented by the Senator himself. Of course, it would be grossly improper for any dependency of the British Empire, for any self-governing dominion of that country, to identify itself as an additional unit in the league of nations with respect to any question concerning either the Empire or any of its constituencies. It would be as inappropriate as the service upon a jury of a kinsman of one of the litigants. It is the part of statesmanship for this country to guard against such a possibility, since human nature is apt to be the same in transactions involving the fate of nations as it is in those which merely involve the interests of individuals. The urge of race is sometimes irresistible, and the urge of necessity, when in community, is equally strong. We can not afford, therefore, to permit this treaty to be ratified without expressly safeguarding ourselves—and in doing that we are doing justice to our associates as well as to ourselves—against a possibility of a preponderance of interest passing judgment upon any subject or problem which may affect us adversely to Great Britain or any of her dependencies. Since that situation can be met, and is, in my judgment, fully met by the so-called McCumber amendment, and does not seem to be met by the amendments, it is the part of wisdom and sound statesmanship to include in our ratification a reservation clause such as I have described.

I think, too, Mr. President, that we should consider how other nations may view our guardianship and protectorate of certain members of the league located in the Western Hemisphere, for we can not suspect Great Britain of designedly packing the assembly, so to speak, with a view of safeguarding her own interests. We can not criticize her control of Persia and of Hedjaz without laying ourselves open to similar imputations and equally just criticisms when our relations with certain countries to the south of us are considered.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I have heard the suggestion made upon several different occasions that the United States would be as much warranted in relying upon the vote of certain nations to the south as Great Britain would upon the votes of her colonies. Does the Senator himself indulge in that belief for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; but I think it is quite as pertinent and quite as just for Great Britain and, perhaps, other nations to lay that imputation at our door as it is for us to lay them at the doors of Great Britain and other countries.

Mr. FALL. I was curious to know whether any Senator here really believes it.

Mr. THOMAS. Frankly, I do not know.

Mr. FALL. Then, I might suggest this to the Senator: Great Britain has an interest in her colonies and there is, to put it in the weakest form, an alliance between the self-governing dominions and Great Britain; their interests are, to a great extent, identical. That is a fact. It is an equally well-established fact, as to which if any doubt is entertained by any Senator the proof is available, that the United States of America has within four years made a proposition to the nations to the south of us that they should enter into an alliance with this country, the basis of the alliance being the basis of this treaty—what the President of the United States has said is the heart of the treaty—and it is also an established fact that each of those nations rejected the proposition, while the British colonies or the British self-governing dominions, which are a portion of the British Empire, have adhered to the British alliance.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Mexico is now speaking of alliances. I had no thought of an alliance between the United States and countries to the south of us, but of alleged control over them.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator was saying that it might be urged that the United States could be criticized because of the fact that certain nations to the south would be controlled by the United States in their votes, as the British colonies might be controlled by Great Britain. The two cases are not at all parallel; and I am wondering if there is a Senator here who believes that the United States could count upon the vote of those countries.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think there is a parallel. Let us take Panama, for example. That nation is the bastard offspring of the Roosevelt administration. It was the outgrowth of the resentment of that administration against the Senate of the Colombian Republic, because it assumed to exercise the same power to change a treaty that we are now asserting. Without the support of this Government Panama never would have come into existence in all probability, and without that support she certainly would have received no recognition from the great powers across the sea; at least, it would not have received recognition as promptly as it was given. It is entirely under the influence of the United States.

Now, if the Senator from New Mexico asks me whether I believe that any attempt would be made by the United States to influence the vote of Panama in the league assembly as to any matter affecting our interests, I answer promptly, "No." I have too high an opinion of the honor and the dignity of my country to assume that for a moment; and I am equally charitable in believing that Great Britain would, under similar circumstances, disdain to influence the representatives of Persia or Hejaz. It may be that my altruism is altogether too idealistle, but there is certainly just as much basis for one assumption as for the other.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. FALL. What basis is there for the assumption that the United States would have any reason to influence those votes? The United States has nothing to protect; the United States acquires no territory; the United States acquires affirmatively nothing, while under this treaty Great Britain acquires practically the earth. Great Britain would have a reason possibly for influencing votes, while the United States would have none whatsoever in so far as material or selfish interests are concerned.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can not look very far into the future; but inasmuch as this entire discussion is based upon the assumption that the United States may become involved in disputes or differences against which she must safeguard herself now, I must assume that some such disputes or differences will ultimately arise.

The United States gave Cuba its independence and has virtually exercised a protectorate over that island ever since. At one time it became our duty to retake possession of Cuba and administer her affairs until order was again restored. The people of Cuba naturally feel under the greatest obligations to the United States, not only because we aided in securing their freedom but also because we give them special consideration in our tariff laws; they enjoy a degree of reciprocity that is very valuable to them and which is also peculiar to them.

The Government of Nicaragua stands, and has rested for years, on the bayonets of the United States marines. To remove them would virtually invite the collapse of that Government. That is known and realized better in Nicaragua than it is here; for down there even a suggestion that we withdraw our marines would cause political and social panic throughout the Republic, if it is a Republic. Consequently, in some great controversy that may in the future intrude itself upon our affairs, I can see no reason why our adversary should not regard our relations with such a country with the same suspicion that we regard, or assume to regard, those of Great Britain with other countries.

What is true of Nicaragua is true of Haiti. That Government since the year 1913 has been virtually under our control, and has prospered accordingly. We have, then, in a political sense, and probably in an economic sense, four dependencies in this hemisphere which are as much subjects to us and to our influence as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the South African Union are to the influence of the British Empire.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. FALL. The Senator indicates that so long as we have marines in Nicaragua we might be able to count upon our influence availing something with the vote of Nicaragua; that because——

Mr. THOMAS. What I meant to say—and what I think I did say—was that it gave to other powers the same reason for suspecting us that the attitude of other countries to Great Britain gives us for suspecting Great Britain.

Mr. FALL. I did not understand; I thought the Senator was suggesting it as his judgment that such would be the case.

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. FALL. It is my mistake. I have no hesitancy in saying that if the Senator thinks by virtue of the fact that we have marines in Haiti we might possibly elect some one from Haiti to sit in the assembly and in that way control the vote of her representatives, I agree with him; if he makes the same statement in reference to Nicaragua, I agree with him; but if the Senator thinks that if it were not for the present peculiar relations between the countries we could count upon the vote of either of those countries I can not agree with him; and I hope that the conditions that exist to-day may not continue for a very great many years.

Mr. THOMAS. Nobody, Mr. President, more cordially joins in the expression of that sentiment than myself. Let me reiterate, in view of the interruption, that I repudiate the view that the Government of the United States would avail or attempt to avail itself of these adventitious conditions. I am trying to press home the fact that if Great Britain lives in a glass house—and perhaps she does—we may occupy the same sort of a mansion in her estimation and that of a great many other members of the league.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The Senator understands, I assume, that those who are advocating the Johnson amendment are not attempting to restrict Great Britain as to any influence which she may have either in Persia, in Egypt, or in Mecca and Medina, but that the only purpose is to place the United States upon an equality with what is commonly known as the British Empire, which has votes, as we understand, for her self-governing dominions as well as for herself.

Mr. THOMAS. I know that is the attitude of the Senator and others who favor the amendment, and if I assume their premises I must accept their conclusions.

Mr. President, I am concerned at present merely in giving my view of the situation as explanatory of the vote which I shall cast, if we ever reach a vote. I shall vote against this amendment and for one of the reservations to which I have made reference, my purpose being to accomplish by that means the same end which Senators who are supporting the amendment are seeking to accomplish; in other words, our purpose seems to be mutual, but our methods are variant.

I come now, Mr. President, to the consideration very briefly of the relation of the colonies or self-governing dominions to Great Britain—and let me say by way of digression that I am in full sympathy with the views expressed here regarding the inclusion of India as an independent member of the league. I do not understand it. I know that India was of great service during the war. Her petty princes furnished troops and treasure. Her people made sacrifices for the cause of the Allies that measure up to those which were made by the great powers themselves. Of her loyalty during this war there can be no question, with here and there a possible temporary and short-lived exception. Hence, I conclude that India was given this representation because of the magnitude and the splendor of her service and sacrifice in the Great War against Germany.

That, however, does not answer the objections which are made to the inclusion in the league of the dependency of a country with that country, and upon the same terms. That has been done; and if there were any way of avoiding it by considering India as a separate subject of amendment I confess that I should be somewhat perturbed as to my action. But so far as the self-governing dominions are concerned they are as nearly sovereign as nations can be as to everything except foreign affairs and the nominal allegiance which they owe to the King of Great Britain. If I remember correctly, the governments of these self-governing dominions declared war formally against Germany. Their legislatures certainly voted the money necessary to carry on and pay the expenses of their participation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The idea suggested itself to me that the logic of the Senator's present statement is that while the United States is now a great nation, much more powerful at home and much more powerful in the councils of the nations and of the world because it is a nation and not a confederation of 48 States, in so far as our power in the world is concerned, if we should enter this league we would be much more powerful if we were merely a confederation of the 48 States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not draw that conclusion. Certainly it is far from my intention to say anything upon which such a conclusion could be based, because I have made to that subject no reference whatever. I may say to the Senator, however, that I am unable to perceive how the United States would be more powerful or influential within the league than it would be without it.

Mr. FALL. I agree with the Senator thoroughly there. I think the United States is more than six times as strong out of it as it will be in it, even granting her an equal voting power with Great Britain.

Mr. THOMAS. Without challenging the accuracy of that statement or accepting it, I may say that, in my judgment, if the United States enters this league under a treaty containing part 13, unmodified and unamended, its influence and power will not only be largely diminished but it is merely a question of time when it, with the other nations of the earth, may disappear under the submerging tides of international socialism. But I shall address myself to that part of the treaty when the amendment which the Senator proposes to offer, to strike it out, shall come up for consideration.

Mr. President, Canada and the other self-governing dominions are closely allied with Great Britain. Their first allegiance, outside of their own interest, is to the mother country. It would be strange if it were not so, and particularly in view of their common experiences during the last four and a half years. But these provinces constitute far-flung portions of the British Empire. Great Britain is the mother of self-governing dominions, the great colony nation, because she knows how to deal with, how to manage, and how to develop colonies, something which no other nation has learned; something which no other nation except our own ever will learn. The American Revolution and its disastrous consequences to England taught the people of that country the most valuable lesson of their history. They learned, by an experience which cost them the loss of their fairest domains, that English-speaking people and Anglo-Saxon races must exercise and enjoy the privilege of self-government and will assert it in open rebellion should it be refused by the governing power. Having learned that, she wisely applied it in all instances except one to English-speaking people, with the result that she has builded great communities—great, powerful, intelligent, and free nations—in the four quarters of the globe; and it was well that she did so, for she needed the inspiration of their encouragement and the practical assistance of their soldiers and their money during the recent crisis, in which her very life was imperiled.

But, Mr. President, there are many conditions largely local to these dominions which are more in harmony with American interests, with American points of view, and with American destiny than they are with those of Great Britain, and I think it is a mistake to assume in this discussion the antagonism of these dominions to us and the certainty of their identification with Great Britain as to any matter of dispute that might come between her and ourselves.

Indeed, I have regretted the assumption, frequently made here, of a condition of continued and chronic hostility of Great Britain to America, for all this discussion leads to the conclusion that, as to controversies which may come before the league for consideration or as to affairs which may not be controversial, the interests of Great Britain and those of the United States would be found in conflict or hostile to a greater or less degree. I do not think so. I have believed from the moment we went into this war that the one great security to the future peace of the world would be a mutual and permanent understanding between the English-speaking peoples, possessing as they do the wealth, the greater part of the commerce, the merchant marine, the civilization, and the institutions which make for the happiness of mankind and the prosperity of nations. I think that is a feeling, partly instinctive but nevertheless growing, among thoughtful people upon both sides of the ocean; and the principal faith which I have in this proposed league is the dominance of Great Britain and the United States within its councils, supplemented by the recognition of the nationalities of these great English-speaking dominions. They will be found together in the great majority of instances where league action is required.

Before the war, Mr. President, when international conflicts were discussed, and particularly when the urgency of preparation became one of the active incidents of our congressional life, men mentally visioned some antagonist threatening—perhaps remotely, but nevertheless threatening—the security of the United States. What country was it? The country, Mr. President, which had devoted itself to militarism, which had become the dominant power of the European Continent, which preached war and practiced conquest, whose commerce was extended into every country and whose industrial domination of the world seemed to be but a question of years. It was Germany which instinctively materialized in the public imagination whenever the thought of war or preparation for the national security became the dominant note of public thought and discussion.

Events proved that this instinct was a sure one; that it was neither misplaced nor misdirected. She was not building a fleet which she intended ultimately to surpass that of the British Empire, she was not increasing her land armament from year to year, she was not expanding her sources of military equipment at all times, for nothing. The wonder is, Mr. President, that the world was unprepared for the cataclysm when it came. The wonder is that it should have sat supinely during all the years when every evidence indicated the coming storm, for we saw shortly after that storm broke that it was the culmination of a series of events, every one of which had thundered its prophecy into the ears of mankind for many years.

We talk of preparation now, Mr. President. A subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has for the last three months been engaged in hearing experts and other advisers concerning the needs of a permanent Army. We have received a mass of information, most of it of great value, and I have no doubt it will enable us to formulate something of an intelligent character which the Senate may be induced to adopt.

But during all the discussion which has succeeded the war with Germany, what is it that lies behind this need for preparation? What is there in the world which menaces its future peace, and which may draw America into another great conflict? There is another nation pursuing the footsteps of Germany, extending its preparation and its power, obtaining foothold in China and Siberia, a nation which took advantage of the last great world cataclysm by imposing upon the helpless Chinese Government a series of demands, 21 in number, the clear purpose of which was to acquire control of all the material resources of that great country, including its population. Why? We do not know. We can only conjecture. But we may reason by analogy and from experience.

We know that autocracy is the antithesis of free government. We feel, therefore, that a nation engaged in constant imitation of a great autocracy which has disappeared for the time, desirous of the possession of the world's commerce in the Orient, chafing under discriminations of race which have been imposed in this country for the best of reasons—social, racial, and economic—with the great Empire of Russia, its once antagonist, prone in the dust, must have some ultimate objective which may be accomplished without war with America, but which may, on the other hand, involve us, for our future is on the Pacific.

Mr. President, I do not refer to this subject with a view of casting any reflection or imputation upon the Japanese people or Empire. I trust that our relations with them in the future will be what they have been in the past, and there is room in the world for the expansion of both. Their generous rivalry in commerce, in the arts, and in dominion, if continued upon the high plane of present civilization and with a constant recollection of the horrors of the last war, must make not only for the peace of the world, but for the well-being of millions of people in Asia and America. But we should prepare, nevertheless.

Let us assume, Mr. President, that our relations with Japan may become strained, that somewhere in the near or distant future a cloud may arise between these nations no bigger than a man's hand, but which may spread over the entire horizon, black and thick with the menace of coming disaster. We may need all the friends that we can secure, and I believe that in such an event, whatever the treaty requirements between Great Britain and Japan may be, America and not Great Britain can count upon Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, for their interests are our interests, and, as to this matter, their destiny is our destiny. They speak the same tongue that we do; they enjoy the same institutions that we do; they inherit them from the same great people which won them by scarifices untold. They have already gone upon record, Mr. President, when the events of the past have made some action necessary concerning many of the possible differences that may arise between ourselves and Japan. To say, therefore, that in disputes between the United States and other countries the six votes of Great Britain will act as a unit and against the United States, is to assume a situation which does injustice to these colonies, to ourselves, and doubtless to Great Britain.

Let me concede, for the sake of argument, that we find an antagonist in Great Britain, either because of her interest in our controversy or because of her treaty obligations to our adversary. I think, Mr. President, that we can safely hope for and surely depend upon her great western dominions as to every oriental problem which may present itself for our solution. I am quite content, therefore, with a reservation which precludes the possibility of their preponderant action as to disputes in which any of these members are concerned, and particularly with us, believing that the hand of good fellowship and confidence extended from the United States to these dominions will bring a future fruitage the need of which in some great and momentous crisis may be so urgent that without it our Nation might become subject and our institutions disappear. I shall, therefore, Mr. President, vote against these amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this treaty runs in the name of "His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, by," and then follows the names of the Right Hon. David Lloyd-George and others who signed in behalf of Great Britain; and then "and for the Dominion of Canada by the Hon. Charles Joseph Doherty, minister of justice," and so forth; and then "for the Commonwealth of Australia," and so forth; then "for the Union of South Africa"; then "for the Dominion of New Zealand"; and then "for India" by certain gentlemen.

The treaty proceeds in the name of His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and so forth, and names the other sovereignties—the United States, France, and so on—all parties upon one part and Germany, the party of the second part. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stated the other day, the composition of the British Empire is somewhat peculiar and involved. But, Mr. President, I assume that when the various sovereignties met in the peace conference they met as equals, for, if I understand it correctly, in contemplation of international law the sovereign nations are all upon an equal basis. There is no distinction made either by reason of population or wealth or any other consideration. No matter how large or how small or how old these various sovereignties may be, in contemplation of international law they are equal and they are equally sovereign.

Now, as it seems to me, there has resulted in this treaty a queer condition of things. Whether it was by design or by accident I do not know. At any rate the British Empire, as such, including its self-governing colonies and dominions, has six votes in the league of nations created by the treaty. The British Empire has one vote and each of its self-governing colonies, of whom there are five mentioned in the treaty, has one vote. By what theory this came about is not explained. No other sovereignty which was party to the peace conference is treated in that way. If it is true, as claimed by the President and some Senators who take his view about the matter, that the one vote of any other member of the league is equivalent to the six votes of Great Britain, then I fail to see why Great Britain is given six votes, or the British Empire, perhaps to speak more correctly. I do not know who proposed that the British Empire should have six votes and that every other member of the league should have only one vote. No explanation is given.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For a question, if the Senator will make it a short one. I know the Senator's tendency.

Mr. KING. I think it is a little more than a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is generally a prelude of an argument winding up with a series of questions, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Senator was inquiring why Great Britain's colonies had votes and why six votes were given to no nation other than the one. Will the Senator say that the United States or Japan or France or Italy stood in the same relation as did Great Britain? We have not any self-governing dominions or colonies that correspond with Canada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the Senator will come to his question. I knew what I was yielding to.

Mr. KING. I warned the Senator, and he anticipated, of course.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the colonies of Great Britain occupy an entirely different position from Hawaii, Porto Rico, or any possession which France or Italy may have in Africa or in any other part of the globe?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do. They are British colonies. That is the difference in their position. I am not quarreling at all with Canada or Australia or New Zealand having a vote in a league of nations, because I think that, by population and wealth and intelligence and everything that goes to make a nation, they are entitled to it, much more so than the great majority of the members of the league which are given equal representation in the league by this treaty. The trouble is the way the British Empire is constituted and the dual theory upon which they seem to have proceeded in the construction of the treaty which results in their getting six votes and no others getting more than one. The trouble is that the British Empire as a sovereign, meeting the United States as a sovereign, says, "We will take one vote for the sovereign British Empire and we will give you one vote for the sovereign United States of America, and then we will put each one of our self-governing colonies in for a vote also, but no other nation shall put in any of their self-governing colonies or any of their dependencies." That is brought about in an ingenious way; at least, looking at it in the text it appears to be ingenious. Whether it was designedly so in order to gain an advantage, I do not express any opinion, because I know nothing about what was said over there, but no doubt the British colonies, which had contributed such great aid to the mother country in the war—Canada, Australia, and the rest of them—said, "We are entitled to a vote; we really are nations." When those five great overseas colonies notified Great Britain that they had to have a vote, I suppose Great Britain had to yield to them.

The result of it is that the British Empire gets one vote as the British Empire, which offsets the vote of the United States, and then gets five other votes, one to each of its self-governing colonies. It does that, not by saying "We will give to the British Empire one vote and we will give to each one of her colonies a vote also," but she does it not by stratagem, but by the method of saying, "This treaty is made in the name of His Majesty acting for all these colonies, and each one of these colonies shall be a member of the league." Then in another part of the treaty it says that each member of the league shall have one vote. So by putting its colonies in as members of the league and putting us in as a member of the league it gives each one of its colonies the same vote that the United States has, and then it gives to the British Empire another vote besides.

I have listened to some of the very able arguments made in relation to this question, and to the exceedingly able exposition which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has just made of the reasons which induce him to prefer a reservation to an amendment upon this question. I am not convinced by the arguments of those who have persuaded themselves that a reservation is preferable to an amendment.

Let us see, Mr. President. We are asked, by ratifying this treaty, to set up a league of nations with a council and an assembly. The council and the assembly are to sit abroad in foreign lands. We are to have one representative upon each of those bodies.

Now, the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations provides, in effect, that the United States shall have six votes if the British Empire and its colonies have six votes; that we shall have as many as any member of the league. The reservation, on the other hand, says, "No; we shall not enter the league upon an equality with the British Empire. We will enter with one vote and give them six votes, but we will put on a proviso that unless we are willing that they shall do so on any question they shall use but one of their six votes."

Mr. President, I submit it is humiliating to me as an American, and I think it will be humiliating historically to the records of this country as a sovereign nation, to meet the British Empire or any other nation and help organize an international tribunal on the basis that we have one vote to another sovereign, no larger, no better, no more powerful than we, having six times the voting power.

Those who favor the reservation say, "We recognize the humiliation and the injustice of it, but nevertheless we will organize it on this humiliating and unjust basis, and then we will have these six British delegates sit there, and we will not let more than one of them vote, when it comes to voting on anything, without our permission." I think that is a more humiliating spectacle than the original proposition which it is designed to correct. To have the great Empire of Great Britain send six delegates to this convention with their mouths gagged, to be simply ciphers there, denied the power of doing anything that the other one is to do, seems to me to be a most absurd situation for a great international league. I do not think the English, if I know Englishmen—and I do know some—with their sensitive nature, would be very much flattered by substituting the proposed reservation as against the amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Upon that proposition, as there has been so much time devoted to the suggestion that it is more difficult to secure acquiescence of the other countries in an amendment than in a reservation, I desire to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be very much more difficult to secure the acquiescence of Great Britain in reducing her vote from six to one and the acquiescence of the other countries in overturning what they have already done than it would be to secure their acquiescence in giving an equal number of votes to the United States, where in that proposition the United States would undoubtedly have the support of Great Britain, unless Great Britain's intention is to have more influence or power in the league and in the council than she gives to the United States?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, to which I agree. There can be no question, of course, that the nation which has six votes in the assembly has more power. This is put in for a purpose, of course. Nobody proposed that the United States, altruistic as we were, should have six votes and Great Britain one. It may have all been luck or a happy chance or the wisdom of Providence that accounts for this. I do not know. But you do not happen to find it that way—that we have the six votes and Great Britain has the one. So it fortuitously occurs that they enter upon this scheme six times more powerful than we are. Everybody agrees to that. If the people who want to supplement the amendment with a reservation do not agree to that, they ought not to offer their reservation, which is designed to correct the inequality not by putting us where we belong in comparison with Great Britain, but by gagging five of Great Britain's delegates.

Mr. President, it is a curious contrivance. I am not attempting to justify it; I am simply wondering at it. I am astounded at the moderation of the British Empire that, having gotten one vote for the British Empire and then one for each component part of the British Empire which was overseas, it did not take one for every part of the British Empire. Why were they so generous as to give a vote to New Zealand and to India, which is not even self-governing and not populated by whites, and not give a vote to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I think that is easily understood. Great Britain has been promising home rule to Ireland for a great many years, but has never given it. If she gave Ireland equal representation with herself in the league of nations, certainly she would logically be compelled to grant home rule.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I think, Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will permit me to add to his statement, that fact is due to the opposition of Ulster more largely than to the refusal of Great Britain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; there are England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. They are the parent of the British Empire. They do not get a vote. The British Empire gets one vote; the United Kingdom is a part of it; they get none; but the colonies do get votes. Upon what theory they are proceeding is somewhat interesting as a study; but, no matter what theory may be formed or by what reasoning one may account for the situation, the fact remains that the British Empire gets six votes to our one.

It is said if we also had six votes that would be a great injustice to France, to Italy, and to other members of the league. It would be no more of an injustice to them than it is for Great Britain to have six votes, and they have all agreed that Great Britain shall have six votes. It is understood and asserted by the President and others that, of all the nations of the world, we are the one nation that all the European and Asiatic powers trust as disinterested. If that is so, they certainly would not have any objection to giving us representation equal to that of Great Britain.

The statement of the Senator from Colorado and other Senators that we could always rely upon the support of the Republics upon this continent to my mind is not quite conclusive. Without going into the attempt to imagine what sort of questions will be brought before the assembly or what disputes may be referred either to the assembly or to the council, I think it ought to be patent to everyone who is familiar with our diplomatic history with other nations upon this continent that it is not at all certain that in an international controversy they would side with us rather than with some European power. I do not claim at all that the colonies of Great Britain would be controlled by Great Britain; I do not think it is necessary to assert that; and I do not think it can be truthfully asserted. All I say is that naturally a dependency or self-governing colony will be more apt to take the view of the mother country than it will of some other country.

The time to correct this condition, if it is wrong, is now. I think the covenant is practically unamendable, for it can only be amended by unanimous consent of all the members who have representation on the council and a majority of the other members who have representatives on the assembly.

I utterly disagree to the theory that we must not touch this mass of provisions; that we must accept it with all the errors and faults which it has and which everybody agrees are numerous, because if we made any change it would involve the necessity of the other parties to the contract agreeing to the change. Of course, it might, but they are all existent; the cables are working; the peace conference is in session, and the peace conference is subject to the orders of the Governments which appointed it. Even if the peace conference were not in session, the Governments which appointed it could accept any amendment they saw fit to accept. Most of the amendments which have been suggested are amendments which Senators claim to be superfluous, because they already represent the true intent and meaning of the treaty. If that is so they would be accepted out of hand forthwith, without a day's or a minute's delay. So, Mr. President, I regard the assertion that this document must not be touched because it would involve resubmission to the other parties as—I will not say not made in good faith, but I think the design of it is more to prevent any amendment at all than to show the impossibility of successful amendment.

Mr. President, I have seen in the public prints since this amendment designed to put us upon a basis equally advantageous as that upon which Great Britain is put in the treaty has come up for discussion that France says she thinks she ought to have more representation, and that she agreed to this scheme because she supposed she had to. I can see no earthly reason why, if Great Britain's dependencies are members of the league, the dependencies of France should not be members of the league. It is even discussed in England to-day that they ought voluntarily to relinquish this advantage. They themselves know that it is wrong, and yet we do not seem to have the courage or disposition to correct a manifest injustice at the only time when we can correct it.

If in the future there were no practical injustice or disadvantage connected with it at all, as a practical thing I would not have it known that on a record vote here I voted so to minimize my Nation as to put it on a one-to-six basis with Great Britain. I have heard it said as a nursery tale and fable that it took nine tailors to make a man, but heretofore I have never heard American citizens announce that it took six Americans to make one Englishman, and I will never vote that that proposition is true.

As in legislative session,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Amherst W. Barber;

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.; and

S. 3190. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KAHN, Mr. MCKENZIE, and Mr. CALDWELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 644. An act for the relief of Oscar Smith;

H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Perry E. Borchers because of losses suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba;

H. R. 683. An act for the relief of William E. Johnson;

H. R. 909. An act for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue;

H. R. 946. An act for the relief of James A. Showen;

H. R. 6289. An act for the relief of the executor or administrator of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased;

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt;

H. R. 9697. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La.;

H. R. 9448. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 10107. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Suffolk West Association of Congregational Churches of Boston, Mass., and a petition of the Men's Club of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Newton Center, Mass., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty without amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Nebraska League for the Preservation of American Independence and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the James Connolly Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Taunton, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless certain reservations or amendments are adopted, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Klamath Post No. 8, American Legion, of Klamath Falls, Oreg., praying for the adoption of the so-called Johnson amendment to the treaty of peace with Germany, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 3301) to authorize the disposition of the proceeds from use of the Laguna Dam, Yuma reclamation project, for irrigation purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3302) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Wheeler;

A bill (S. 3303) restoring to the pension rolls the name of George B. Taylor; and

A bill (S. 3304) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ware; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3305) further to assure title to lands granted the several States, in place, in aid of public schools; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3306) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Austin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3307) authorizing the Ottawa and Chippewa Tribes of Indians of Michigan to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3308) for the payment of certain claims of general officers of Volunteers for three months' pay proper for Civil War service as reported by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt was read twice and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

H. R. 9697. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 9448. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 10107. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

H. R. 644. An act for the relief of Oscar Smith;

H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Perry E. Borchers because of losses suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox, while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba;

H. R. 683. An act for the relief of William E. Johnson;

H. R. 909. An act for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue;

H. R. 946. An act for the relief of James A. Showen;

H. R. 6289. An act for the relief of the executor or administrator of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased.

SALE OF SURPLUS MACHINE TOOLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, and other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

INCREASED SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report submitted by me a few days ago on House joint resolution 151, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE FOR MRS. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 7138) granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all mail matter sent by the post by Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of the late Theodore Roosevelt, under her written autograph signature, be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. In accordance with an understanding which I had with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] before he left the Chamber, I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, October 27, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 25, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Out of the finer instincts of our being, impelled by the longings of our hearts, from the deeps we cry unto Thee our Father in heaven: lead us we pray Thee by Thy spirit into green pastures and by the side of still waters. Restore our souls and lead us into the paths of righteousness for His name's sake; and

Yea, though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we will fear no evil: for Thou art with us; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort us.

Thou preparest a table before us in the presence of our enemies: Thou annointest our head with oil; our cup runneth over.

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow us all the days of our life; and we shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

So we hope, and aspire, and pray. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—YUMA PROJECT, ARIZONA.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of the bill (S. 2610) to provide for the disposal of certain waste and drainage water from the Yuma project, Arizona, from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. I have consulted with the chairmen of both committees and a majority of the members, and they have consented to it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 333. An act providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place;

H. R. 446. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6, of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 753. An act for the relief of Susie Currier;

H. R. 2452. An act for the relief of Charles A. Carey; and

H. R. 5007. An act granting citizenship to certain Indians.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the third congressional district of Wisconsin easily ranks with the best in the Nation—equaled by few, excelled by none. There at Madison is located the State capitol, with admittedly one of the finest capitol buildings in the Nation. There is located the world-famed university that this year has an enrollment of nearly 8,000 students, and there is the dream city of Madison nestling among her four lakes. A noted writer once wrote the words, "See Naples and die." Out in Wisconsin we say, "See Madison, then live there forever."

The Wisconsin River cuts the district in two from east to west, dividing Richland and Crawford Counties on the north from the counties of Iowa and Grant on the south, and the mighty Mississippi sweeps the entire western border of the district. The third congressional district produces more lead and zinc ore than all the rest of the State, and millions of dollars are invested in this industry in Lafayette, Grant, and Iowa Counties. Tobacco is extensively grown in portions of the district, and, that you may realize how extensively, I cite the fact that Stoughton had at last report 68 tobacco warehouses, and the people were still building.

But, while great in all these and many other agricultural pursuits, Wisconsin, following the advice of the late Gov. William D. Hoard, of blessed memory, sings the Song of the Cow, for while Wisconsin in population ranks but twelfth in the sisterhood of States, in dairy products she ranks first, and in the manufacture of Swiss cheese has no rival on the globe; and the queen of all Swiss cheese-making counties in Wisconsin is the county of Green, lying in the southeast corner of the third congressional district.

The first white settlers in Green, like most other counties in southern Wisconsin, came largely from the Eastern States and for a number of years farmed in the good old New England way with but moderate success. Later a colony of people from Switzerland settled in what is now known as New Glarus, in Green County, and began to clear the land for farming purposes—not in the old way but for dairying. About the second year of the settlement they built of logs a cooperative cheese factory and began the manufacture of butter and cheese. The natives looked upon this inovation first with disdain, then curiosity, and then wonderment. For while they were not getting rich the Switzer kept on milking, buying more land and more cows. More Swiss came every year to open farms, milk, and make cheese, and dairying became a fixed industry in the county. Finally the other settler farmers began to follow the lead of their Swiss neighbors, and thus, before other portions of the State realized what they had lost and were yearly losing, Green County was leading, and still is leading all counties of the Nation in the manufacture of Swiss, Limburger, block, and brick cheese. To give you an idea of what this great industry has done for Green County, you will be surprised to learn that the county is only 20 miles square, has a population (1910) of 21,641 people, and was the wealthiest agricultural county in the United States per capita and had within her borders more than 200 cheese factories and creameries, the former largely predominating.

Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make to the House this morning, in which I think all the Members will be interested. While we regard Wisconsin as the great drive wheel of the dairy products of the Nation, there is one county in my district we regard as the hub of that wheel, and that is Green County. And the good people of the city of Monroe and of Green County have sent to me a Swiss wheel cheese. I am going to take that cheese and place it down in the restaurant to-day for lunch. [Applause.] I have seen the manager of the restaurant, and he is going to furnish some rye bread to serve with it. Now, we used to be able to say in Wisconsin——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for just a word?

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I trust it is as big as a wagon wheel.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. I have not opened it yet; but it is here, and, knowing how the Nestor of the House loves all the good things of life, I hope he will not be disappointed. [Laughter.] There used to be another supposed necessity which went with rye bread and cheese in Wisconsin——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Who furnishes the crackers and the other fixings?

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. I do not know. I furnish the cheese, the restaurant manager furnishes the rye bread, and for "crackers and other fixings" the gentleman from Wyoming must do his own rustling. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is this the product that made Milwaukee famous?

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. No; that beverage will not be on the table. Some people regard it as "infamous," but I will let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] settle that question between them. In the meantime all come down to the lunch room and eat Swiss cheese. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. If this is a good cheese, why not have it distributed through the folding room, so that each man can get his share of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. I advise the gentleman to "eat such things as are set before him and ask no questions for conscience sake." [Laughter.]

It is not regarded as being good form to look a gift horse in the mouth. [Laughter.]

For the great pleasure it gives me to aid you all in fighting the high cost of living for to-day, I am indebted to the Badger Cheese Co., of Monroe, Wis., who donated the cheese, at the same time writing me the following letter which I desire to read into the RECORD:

MONROE, WIS., October 20, 1919.

Hon. J. G. MONAHAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MONAHAN: I am sending you to-day by express a sample of Green County made Swiss cheese, which I hope you will place on the table of the House restaurant, and that the Representatives will partake of the same. Green County, Wis., has long been famed for its production of foreign styles of cheese. A little county of some 20 miles square that has a reputation of producing more foreign styles cheese than any like area of the Nation and is a great factor in the cheese production of our State.

We wish to inform the House that Green County makes nothing but foreign styles cheese—Swiss, Brick, and Limburger—and we feel that the Swiss cheese that we are making is equal to any cheese that has ever been imported into the country, and it is our ambition to increase the consumption of domestic Swiss cheese; and I feel that after sampling the cheese which we have sent you, that you will agree with Mr. MONAHAN, our Representative from this district, in these assertions.

Trusting that you will enjoy eating this cheese as well as we enjoy sending it, we beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

BADGER CHEESE CO.,
RAY A. YOUNG, Sales Manager.

[Applause.]

CAPT. HARRY GRAHAM.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 8272 and pass it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8272) to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry immediately below that of Capt. John Randolph.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain a little as to why the bill is brought forward at this time?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if there is going to be any prolonged discussion, I will have to object. It is a very extraordinary matter to bring in the bill at this time, and now we have a special rule on an important public matter. If there is going to be any discussion over this subject, I will have to object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that his colleague have three minutes in which to explain the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill has to do with Capt. Harry Graham, who entered the Army from civil life, rose to the rank of captain, and served in the Army for over 18 years. He was attending the officers' school at Fort Leavenworth, and there he was charged with two other officers with fraudulently tracing a map. He demanded a court-martial, and was tried with the other two, who pleaded guilty, and were convicted and dismissed from the Army. He brought his case to Congress. The Committees on Military Affairs of the House and the Senate investigated the matter thoroughly, and came to a unanimous decision that Capt. Harry Graham had been unjustly put out of the Army; that there was absolutely no ground for the judgment of court-martial. We brought in a bill to reinstate him in the Army as captain, but the time he was out caused him to lose about

1,200 files on the lineal list. The war came on, and he was given a temporary grade of major, and served——

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman forgot to state that the Congress did reinstate him.

Mr. McKENZIE. I meant to do that. Congress did reinstate him as a captain. He is one of the oldest flyers in the service. He is a man against whose character there has never been a question, and the only reason why I now take the time of the House to ask that this be done is that on the 1st of November the rearrangement of the officers in the Regular Army takes place, and if Capt. Harry Graham, remains at the bottom of the list, as he is now, he will continue to be only a captain for years and years, while young men who have come into the service in the last year or two will outrank him. This simply puts him back to the place where he belonged when he was put out of the Army?

Mr. KITCHIN. Is he in the service now?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; he is in the service now, I will say to the gentleman. He was in service at Kelley Field.

Mr. KITCHIN. What was the object of his superior officers in trying to "railroad" him out of the service?

Mr. McKENZIE. That may be too strong a word. My friend from Minnesota interjected that into my statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. But I understood the gentleman to say that "railroading" was the best word to be used. How long ago was that?

Mr. McKENZIE. That was in 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. What object did they have in getting him out of the service?

Mr. McKENZIE. They had no particular object that I know of. The other two officers pleaded guilty to the charge.

Mr. KITCHIN. How did he plead guilty if there was no evidence?

Mr. McKENZIE. The other two pleaded guilty. He pleaded not guilty and demanded the right to have his case cleared up.

Mr. KITCHIN. What I wanted to get at is if this gentleman was "railroaded" out or put out for some ulterior motive, what action did the committee take in regard to the officers who forced him out of the service?

Mr. McKENZIE. We had no jurisdiction over them, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did they criticize or investigate it?

Mr. McKENZIE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I if the gentleman will yield a moment I will tell the gentleman that the only evidence on God's earth against the man was that they claimed that the map he made was so perfect that a man could not have made it unless he had had a model to copy from.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry immediately below that of Capt. John Randolph.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that for general information of the Congress I be permitted to print in the RECORD several thousand letters which have come to me from every congressional district in the United States demanding of Congress that the people of the United States be protected against threatened anarchy in this land.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print several thousand letters. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PRIVILEGED RESOLUTION—MINING OF COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, ETC.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 358, submit a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

House resolution 358.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2775, being "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public lands." That the reading of the Senate bill shall be dispensed with and for the purpose of amendment the House committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill. That the substitute shall have a privileged status until the conclusion of its consideration, and the debate shall be confined to the substitute. That at the conclusion of the general debate on the substitute the substitute shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule. That at the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall arise and report the substitute to the House with amendments, if any. That thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the substitute and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I was unable to catch the language as to general debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule does not fix the time for general debate.

Mr. WALSH. But it is to be confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. The debate is to be confined to the bill. The hope is that the majority and minority members of the Committee on the Public Lands will be able to come to an agreement as to general debate.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. GARD. What is contained in the rule as to the consideration of the bill with respect to next Monday's work?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It has a privileged status, and the House can do as it chooses.

Mr. GARD. Under the rule the bill has a privileged status? It continues to-day and Monday—this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the House does not decide otherwise a motion will be made to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The rule is a little peculiar. Instead of its providing that the debate be confined to the bill, this rule provides that the debate shall be confined to the substitute. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The substitute is the bill reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. RAKER. Is that intended to exclude any debate relating to the general Senate bill and all matters in relation to it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule provides for the consideration of the House substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. It is really a House amendment, one amendment, is it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WALSH. To strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert another bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why should not the debate be permitted on the Senate bill that is stricken out? It seems to me to limit debate on the House amendment would not be permitting any discussion of the Senate bill, which was amended by the committee. It would be an unusual restriction on general debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The general subject matter would be under consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there is no substitute before the House. The Senate bill is before the House, with a House amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This rule brings the substitute before the House as an original bill for the consideration of the House.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, this procedure is the same procedure as was adopted when this matter was up at the last Congress under unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. In the Senate bill are provisions that were not included in the House bill. Now, under the rule the debate is confined to the substitute. Is that intended to exclude debate in relation to the Senate bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; the intention was to prevent the gentleman from California and other gentlemen from making political speeches. The purpose of this rule is to confine the debate to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. As a matter of fact we will do under the rule precisely what we did by unanimous consent when the bill was considered before.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Exactly so. We shall follow exactly the procedure that was followed when this bill was considered at another time by the House.

Mr. CARTER. Under unanimous consent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I call the attention of the gentleman to this difference: Formerly the bill did not contain different provisions in the original bill and in the substitute. At the present time there are provisions in the Senate bill that are not in the House bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, the gentleman from California can discuss any question that was raised in the Senate bill. The purpose is to confine the debate to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. To oil leasing, and so forth.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; to oil leasing and coal leasing and phosphates and sodium and other questions dealt with by the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman give the House any idea about how long it is contemplated this will be a continuing order?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not. The thought of the gentleman in charge of the bill was that he would be able to conclude its consideration in a couple of days.

Mr. WINGO. The reason I ask is that there are at least two matters that I have in mind, that I feel sure the Rules Committee will be inclined to give rules for their consideration next week, especially if we are going to adjourn on November 10; and I wanted to know whether or not this bill was to be used as a means of taking up all the time between now and November 10, to prevent the consideration of emergency matters.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; the purpose of the committee is to expedite the consideration of the bill as rapidly as possible.

Mr. RAKER. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question in regard to his statement about the debate being confined to the subject of the bill. In section 1 the House has not included that provision in regard to alien ownership that the Senate has included.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that is inherent in this whole subject, and, of course, will be under consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Very well. One other question. Sections 40 and 41 relate to entirely different matter, in regard to the anti-trust law. Now, as I understand the gentleman's explanation of the rule, it does not prohibit a full discussion, if Members so desire, as to the provisions of sections 40 and 41 of the Senate bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly not.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Referring to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and the answer of the gentleman from Kansas relative to the effect of this rule on District business, I understand that this rule has no further effect than to give this oil-leasing bill a privileged status.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A privileged status.

Mr. MAPES. The same as an appropriation bill, and does not in itself dispense with District business on District day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; that is a question for the House to decide on Monday, when the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] moves to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the gentleman is assuming that the gentleman from Oregon will make that motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am assuming that he will make that motion. If he does not make it, then the gentleman from Michigan will have a clear field.

Mr. MAPES. Whether he makes it or not, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will have the right to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of District business.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. This rule makes it in order for the House to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2775. Then it further provides that the substitute shall have a privileged status until the conclusion of its consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that sentence should read that S. 2775 shall have a privileged status until the conclusion of its consideration?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. WALSH. You are going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a certain bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We are going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the action of the House Committee on the Public Lands rather than the action of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. But you are not going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the substitute. The only reason this is before the House is because the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is to consider the Senate bill as amended by the House Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The House Committee on the Public Lands have brought in a substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. WALSH. They have done no such thing. They have brought in a Senate bill with House amendment, but we are still considering the Senate bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If that is the view of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he is entitled to it. I am taking the parliamentary view of the situation in which this bill comes before the House under this rule.

Mr. WALSH. But I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is wise to establish the precedent of bringing a rule to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a Senate bill and in the same rule making provision that a substitute shall have a privileged status when there is no question of a substitute involved? And I submit that under the rules of the House and under any rule that the committee have reported we have never given any substitute a privileged status.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, the House by unanimous consent did exactly this thing a year ago, and the gentleman no doubt was here and consented to it.

Mr. WALSH. I was here; and I know that the unanimous consent a year ago was simply that the House should consider the House amendment in lieu of the Senate bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And that is exactly what we are doing to-day.

Mr. WALSH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. You are wiping out consideration of the Senate bill altogether, and you are going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a Senate bill, and then, instead of giving the Senate bill a privileged status, you are giving the substitute a privileged status, and there is no substitute involved, but simply a House amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has confused the action of the Committee on the Public Lands in bringing a substitute before the House rather than the Senate bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further? He has been very kind in yielding for questions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman say what it is about an oil-leasing bill that makes it necessary to present a unanimous-consent request or bring in a rule to handle it in this novel way?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not a novel way.

Mr. WALSH. It has not been done with any other bill except an oil-leasing bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Matters are considered under special rule, as the gentleman from Massachusetts knows, if he will consult the precedents of this and similar character of bills throughout the history of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Massachusetts is thoroughly wrong. This thing has practically been done time and again—to consider a substitute instead of a bill, or one amendment instead of a bill, or a House bill in the nature of an amendment, instead of the bill itself.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that "the gentleman from Massachusetts" has not controverted that proposition at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thought that was what the gentleman was controverting.

Mr. WALSH. The confusion contributed by the gentleman from Kansas is apparently contagious. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose of the rule making the substitute in order as the original bill was to give a wider latitude for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FERRIS. If you proceeded otherwise, there only being one amendment, you could not consider it section by section.

Mr. WALSH. That is taken care of in another part of the rule. You are giving a substitute a privileged status instead of the bill upon which you go into Committee of the Whole to consider.

Mr. FERRIS. The whole thought was to have this considered section by section.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the form of the rule is the correct one in order to give a wide latitude for amendment. I want to make this suggestion or inquiry: Line 11 of the rule provides that the debate shall be confined to the substitute. I suppose what it means is that it shall be confined to the subject matter under discussion; not necessarily the language in the substitute, but to the subject matter. In other words, if there is anything in the Senate bill that relates to the subject matter that was modified by the House, that general provision could be discussed.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield? The suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming would eliminate the discussion of the Senate bill which the House struck out.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, my suggestion was with a view of making it clear that these matters could be discussed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I stated to the gentleman from California that the rule was for the purpose of preventing him and others from making political speeches.

Mr. RAKER. I never made a political speech in my life in discussing a bill, if I discussed it at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As a matter of fact, the subject treated of in the two bills is the same, so what difference does it make?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and pending that motion I wish to see if we can not agree on some time for general debate.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the chairman any suggestion to make?

Mr. SINNOTT. Requests for time on this side will not consume over an hour.

Mr. FERRIS. I think we can accommodate ourselves to that.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I would like 40 minutes on the bill. There are vital matters in the bill which I wish to discuss.

Mr. SINNOTT. Perhaps the gentleman from Oklahoma will yield the gentleman from California 40 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I want it understood in advance that I want an opportunity to be heard on these important matters in this legislation.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the debate will be very liberal under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RAKER. I want it on general debate. This is important legislation and there are four important amendments eliminated by the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to state to the gentleman from California that one hour on a side seems ample. This bill has been through the House four times, and I will be liberal and give the gentleman more time than I use myself. I do not like to promise the gentleman 40 minutes out of 60 minutes to make a speech on a subject that comes up later in the bill. The chairman has stated that the five-minute debate will be liberal. If the gentleman from California speaks 40 minutes there will not be four souls left here to hear him.

Mr. RAKER. That is a gratuitous statement on the part of the gentleman from Oklahoma. If they stay to hear me, all right; and if they do not, it is all right. I have the right to be heard on the merits of the bill, and I want the promise of that time and not lose my rights by consenting in advance. There are important matters that I will discuss when I get the time, and state why I did not file a minority report.

Mr. SINNOTT. I only expect to take 10 minutes myself in debate.

Mr. RAKER. I want 40 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will give the gentleman 10 minutes of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me, in view of the fact that all other gentlemen here sacrifice themselves in this matter and only propose to take a few minutes, that the gentleman from California could conclude his remarks in 30 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. May I say this to the gentleman: I have always deferred my right. I have not taken the time of the House. I have been considerate about imposing upon the House, but here is one time where matters of importance are involved. I have been upon the Committee on the Public Lands for a number of years, during which time this subject has been considered. I think this is a time when certain statements should be made from the floor in respect to certain phases of the bill, whether there be 400 Members present, 200 Members present, or only 3, so that the matter may be brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] ought to ask for nearly all of the time that is allotted. I feel that his modesty ought to overcome his desire, but evidently it does not. If gentlemen on the other side are willing to grant the gentleman from California 10 minutes, we will give him 30 minutes, which will make 40 minutes, and although I have been chairman of the committee for several years, or was until the House changed its complexion, I will content myself with 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think that is unfair to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it is fair.

Mr. DYER. Can not the gentleman give him all of the time?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, the gentleman from California has not taken any more time than have the rest of the Members of this House.

Mr. DYER. I know that the gentleman from California is of a very sacrificing nature.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to represent my constituents on this floor.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that general debate be confined to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FERRIS]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2775.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection if the gentlemen are willing to divide the time equally.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon that there be two hours of general debate, one hour on a side? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2775.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be notified when I have consumed 10 minutes of time. I feel at this time that it is not necessary to enter into a very long or elaborate discussion of this measure for the reason that it is very familiar to the older Members of the House. Legislation similar to this, or bills practically molded upon the same principles as are contained in the substitute before the House, with a few slight changes, generally conceded to improve the bill, have been passed by this House. Practically this measure has been before the House, and the House has passed it at least three times. The subject has been pending before Congress for the past seven years, and has received a great deal of attention and a great deal of discussion. I feel, however, that some of the features of the legislation should briefly be called to the attention of the House. It is a common thing for sponsors of legislation to designate the particular legislation which they may have before the House as legislation of great and supreme importance, and I think it may be said of this bill that it is a measure of supreme importance to the people of this country. In a general way it involves, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, the releasing of enormous areas of our public lands that have been withdrawn from development and exploitation for several years. Approximately 6,500,000 acres of possible oil lands have been withdrawn from development in our Western States; 2,700,000 acres of phosphate lands have been withdrawn; 3,500,000 acres of oil-shale land have been classified and will become subject to development under this bill, and 70,000,000 acres of coal land are involved; 29,000,000 acres of those coal lands have already been classified. The Secretary of the Interior tells us that while the classified lands may be acquired under existing law, that law is admittedly inadequate and unsuited to the development of coal deposits, because it limits the area which may be acquired to an amount too small for successful mining. The importance of this measure in a general way is exemplified by these figures of enormous areas, in our Western States, withheld from development. The importance of the legislation in a specific way as it relates to oil lands is emphasized by Dr. Manning, the Director of the Bureau of Mines. He tells us in his last report that a review of the American petroleum industries shows that the industrial development and general prosperity of the United States depends upon an adequate supply of petroleum. He says further:

Faced with this growing need for petroleum, we have to consider seriously the means whereby an adequate supply for the future can be obtained. We know that the domestic output does not meet the present consumption, and that the amount of this deficit will probably continue to increase. Of the original available supply under ground, it is estimated by the United States Geological Survey that we have consumed 40 per cent that is unreplaceable. A diminishing output, with increased consumption, will make the United States more dependent upon foreign fields. It is true that there are vast oil reserves in foreign countries, and if those fields could be developed without hindrance they could, even though consumption continues to increase at the present rate, probably meet the world's demand for the next 10 years at least. Production beyond the 10-year period is not safe, for too many certainties are involved.

Another important feature of this bill relates to the unlocking of lands that have been withdrawn in California and Wyoming. In California lands aggregating from thirty to forty thousand acres of oil lands were withdrawn. In Wyoming from five to ten or twenty thousand acres of land have been withdrawn, and these particular lands in California and in Wyoming were withdrawn from operation after a number of oil claimants had gone upon the lands at the express invitation, the statutory invitation, of the Government of the United States.

Had these withdrawals not taken place in California and Wyoming——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 10 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes additional. Had these withdrawals not taken place in those States many of these oil claimants under the law would have been able to receive patents for their land, if they so desired. Their patents were withheld on account of the withdrawals. Most of these lands are now all in litigation. Something like from twenty to twenty-five or thirty million dollars as a result of the oil production in the land in those two States have been impounded. This bill will enable the Secretary of the Interior to settle all these litigations and will enable further production of oil to be made. That matter will be gone into at length when we come to section 18. One important feature of this bill that should be commented upon is that this bill inaugurates a change of policy in our disposition of our public lands. Heretofore public lands or lands containing minerals described in this bill were disposed of by patenting. That procedure has been eliminated in this bill, and no further public lands containing such minerals will be patented, except under section 37. Those making the necessary discovery will be given a lease to the land. The Government reserves the title, and the Government also reserves the right to establish rules and regulations to prevent waste in the production of oil and in the production of coal and the other minerals. The lessee must sell his product at reasonable prices. A new feature in this bill is the reservation of all helium that may be found in the leased lands. Helium gas is the gas that is necessary to employ in dirigibles in order to prevent combustion. Helium gas is a noncombustible gas. There is more of it in the United States than any other country. During the war we paid to one concern in Texas $1,500,000 for the right to extract helium gas from the oil land owned by the party in question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used the three additional minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield for one minute?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will take an additional minute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to ask the gentleman whether there is any case on record where helium has been discovered in the raw state?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, some contend that the gas known in Kansas as "wind gas" is really a helium gas [laughter], because it is not inflammable.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the kind we have here so frequently?

Mr. BAER. From the gentleman from Texas; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. On the other side.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman does not care to make the obvious answer.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I also want to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The additional minute has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Just one minute. Is the expenditure——

Mr. SINNOTT. When we get to the five-minute rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Just one minute. I want to ask this question. I want to get it in the RECORD here.

Mr. SINNOTT. Not out of my time. I will answer when we get under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will gladly answer when we get to the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I am to get five minutes myself and I will yield one minute from my time to the gentleman from Oregon to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon and the gentleman from Oklahoma have control of the time and the gentleman will have to make arrangements with them.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am willing to yield one minute of my time, as I wish the gentleman to answer the question now in its context.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman is not recognized; the gentleman from Oregon has not yielded the floor, and he has control of the time. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New York if he has control of the time, as he understood the gentleman from Oklahoma had?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will yield that time.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield the gentleman one minute to enable him to answer, so we can get along.

Mr. SINNOTT. Then I will yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to ask the gentleman how you propose to separate the helium from the natural gas and the reservation of that gas to the United States Government for the people?

Mr. SINNOTT. The experts of the War Department spoke to me about that matter, and they say it will be very easily done without in any way jeopardizing the operation of the mine or oil production; that the extraction of this gas makes the ordinary gas it is mixed with more inflammable and a better lighting medium.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It involves both a mechanical and chemical operation?

Mr. SINNOTT. It involves an operation that will not interfere with the oil production.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The United States Government divests its control of the gas in order that helium may be procured?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; the United States Government reserves the right to this gas under the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It divests itself in the first instance of the gas in order to have this operation performed?

Mr. SINNOTT. It never divests itself of the right to extract helium gas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall consume about 10 minutes, and I desire the Chair to call my attention to the fact when I have used that much time. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this is the fourth time the House of Representatives has sought to enact a leasing bill for the development of coal, oil, gas, and phosphate ores of the United States. On three former occasions the House has passed practically by unanimous consent a bill providing a leasing law whereby the Government might get some revenue for the Treasury of the United States and for the reclamation fund of the United States, and in a way supplant the old laws that have grown antiquated and out of date. The bill each time has gone to the Senate, and the Senate has modified it to such an extent that either in conference or by reason of attacks of the public press the bill has been defeated. In the last Congress the bill passed the House. In fact, I think it passed without a dissenting vote, and then it went over to the Senate. It passed the Senate, was sent to conference, came back here, and the conference report was adopted by more than 3 to 1.

It went to the Senate, and 65 Senators signed a round robin that they would pass the bill if they had a chance to vote on it, but it was in the closing days of the session, and some of the Senators made objection to it and took up the time, and so it could not be voted on. It died for want of consideration.

Everybody was for it. It was needed. It was recommended by the Interior Department. It ought to have been passed then. It ought to be passed now. It is a supplanting of old and antiquated laws, and substituting a general lease law that will be orderly, workable, and will develop the West, with a royalty to the Treasury.

Mr. BAER. That bill, though, patented the land, and this only leases it, I understand.

Mr. FERRIS. It had a fourth patent as a bonus to the prospector who discovered the oil. This gives a preference right to a lease. It was not on that proposition that it was defeated at all. It was a filibuster by one Senator. This year the Senate took the initiative and passed the bill first, and in my opinion they passed a pretty good bill. It had some defects as I viewed it; we have remedied some of them; we will remedy a few more of them in the House. I think it is the best bill the Senate has ever passed on the subject.

Some have said that it was a better bill than either House has passed. There were some provisions in it that the Committee on the Public Lands have changed and some provisions I think they had a right to change. There are a few changes yet that I would like to make if I had the power. The House Committee on the Public Lands reported a bill here, and I think in the main it is a good bill. There are a few little amendments I hope we will adjust as we go along and improve upon. But in the main this bill in all things conserves the interests of the Government. It makes it possible to settle up a mass of complicated litigation over which the courts have been scrambling for a number of years and really brings settled conditions out of chaotic conditions in the West. It should be passed soon. It is what is desired by the department. It is desirable all around. It provides for a royalty to the Government on these minerals. Heretofore the Government has received nothing.

The Nation is yet rich in natural resources. It is not impoverished at all. For example, we have between 600,000,000 and 700,000,000 acres of public lands yet the property of the Government; we have about 70,000,000 acres of coal lands yet the property of the Government; we have about 6,000,000 acres of oil lands still the property of the Government; we have 165,000,000 acres of forest reserves still the property of the Government; and some two or three million acres of phosphate land producing phosphate to improve the impoverished soils of the Government are still the property of the Government. And this proposed law makes possible the use, the development, and conservation of those great resources.

The great and boundless West is entitled to something in connection with this. They are entitled to have this bill considered and have it passed. The entire country is entitled to have it passed. Under the old law the Government gets nothing by way of royalties. Under the old law there is no limit as to the amount of land the claimant can get. Under the old law fraud and disturbance and disgraceful conditions have prevailed. This proposed bill, if passed, will put it on a decent, fair basis, so that the States can be developed, so that the Government may collect a royalty, and so men may proceed in an orderly manner under a contract, so that men may know what their rights are and not have them swept away by withdrawal orders, changed rulings, and other changes in policy which the poor prospector can neither fathom nor understand. The claimants and the Government are both entitled to this much.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. RICKETTS. The gentleman stated that we have 7,000,000 acres of oil lands——

Mr. FERRIS. About 6,000,000 acres.

Mr. RICKETTS. Now, is the purpose of this bill to give to the Department of the Interior the right to lease all the land the Government has without any reservation at all?

Mr. FERRIS. They have the power to divide this up into leasing areas of not more than 2,560 acres, and the Secretary of the Interior has the power to grant a permit to the several oil applicants or developers, and when they strike the oil they then have the right to convert that preliminary permit into a lease and go on and mine the oil. Of course there is oil reserved as naval reserves that this law does not apply to. In all cases the Government has the whip hand. There is no instance where the Government's hands are tied. There is no maximum royalty. The sky is the limit.

Mr. RICKETTS. What royalty is fixed in the bill, if you please?

Mr. FERRIS. The minimum royalty is one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, and if the House stands by the committee there will be no maximum. In other words, they can get as much beyond that as they like. In the Senate bill they had a minimum of 12½ per cent and a maximum of 25 per cent beyond which they can not go. I think the House committee very properly struck out the maximum, so that the Secretary of the Interior, or the Government, can get as much as the facts in a given case would warrant. I do not state this with the purpose of inviting the Interior Department to practice extortion on the claimants, but I do not want to tie the Government's hands.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. The permittee can get 2,560 acres?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. In wildcat territory. That seems to be the correct area. That is the view of the Interior Department, Geological Survey, and all experts.

Mr. HULINGS. Where he can develop——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; make investigations and develop.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, how many such tracts can he take up?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is probably better in mathematics than I am. It is estimated there are about 6,000,000 acres, and these tracts are 2,560 acres, if they are full, although many may be less than that acreage, as that is the maximum area.

Mr. HULINGS. Could one man take them all up?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. HULINGS. Is he confined to 2,560 acres?

Mr. FERRIS. He is in a given field and can not take more than three leases in the entire State.

Mr. SNELL. Is not one of the principal reasons for passing this legislation to settle up a large amount of litigation that is going on at the present time?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true as to section 18. It is the relief section of the bill. It is to straighten tangles that exist by reason of the change from a patenting system to a lease system.

Mr. SNELL. And there is no question but what the Government's interests are amply protected by this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I think they are. There may be instances where the House may wish to amend it and change it, and I may offer one or two slight amendments myself. But in the main I feel sure every member of the committee has done his full duty, in the main the Senate of the United States has striven hard for a good bill, and in the main there is no selfishness or greed or caprice or fraud or overreaching of any kind in this legislation.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] is entitled to the very greatest credit. He spent nights and nights and nights, and tedious nights they were, in the most thorough investigation in connection with this bill. The gentleman has always been active on the committee, but this year he has assumed the responsibility of the chairmanship with all the term implies, and is really the best chairman the committee has ever had. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman who spoke previously mentioned the fact that we are now consuming more than our production. He says we ought to lease more land so that we can produce more oil. It seems to me that is a reason why we ought to conserve it and buy oil outside, all that we can get, and save this for later years.

Mr. FERRIS. Who stated that?

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman may have some figures on that that I do not have. I do not think that is the case. In any event, that would vary as the days go by, as new fields are being opened up all the time.

Mr. KELLER. Does not the gentleman think we ought to conserve the oil under those conditions for later years?

Mr. FERRIS. Every week and every month in the year new fields are being opened, for example, in my own State. And this bill has no application to my State, for we have no public lands there, and I am not personally interested in it in any way, or vitally interested, because my people are not interested, unless propositions are put in here which are general in character.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman ought to be interested in the whole proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. I am. I am getting to the point where I can answer the gentleman. They are opening new fields all the time, and they are bringing in new production all the time, and no one would be able to say, I think, that we were using more or less oil at any time than we are producing. On the contrary, steamers are carrying oil every day across the sea, helping to supply the European market, and steamers are being used for that purpose.

Mr. KELLER. Does not the gentleman think we ought to conserve it now in the interest of the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. There are different ways of conserving oil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. It is not always possible to conserve the oil in the ground. Of course, the oil fields are a great deal like a checkerboard. Here is a private holding by the Southern Pacific Railroad or some one else. Here is Government land beside it. If the Government does not proceed with its development, the land is drained by an adjoining owner, and the Government loses everything. The gentleman will recall that several years ago the Congress of the United States gave to the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad grants of alternate sections of land, so that the railways now own alternate sections, and the Government should always be on the alert lest its oil holdings between those sections should be drained. There may be some areas that should be reserved.

Some years ago ex-President Taft withdrew some large areas for a naval reserve. Those, as far as possible, are being conserved within the ground. Why? Because the bulk of this oil is in areas where there is not so much private ownership. But where the land owned by the Government lies side by side with land privately owned, the Congress can not conserve the oil in the private lands, and therefore it is impossible to conserve it in the public lands adjoining them.

There are many things to consider in connection with this great estate. It deserves care, caution, and study by every Member. Your Committee on Public Lands for eight years has been working on this. Your Interior Department has been working on it. Your Geological Survey has been working on it. Your Department of Justice has been working on it. The press has been active. Every line, yes, every section, has been scrutinized by lawyer and layman; by those in and out of Congress; by experts and those who feel they are experts. The law is so much better than existing law that if there be an occasional error the Congress will still be here, probably a better Congress than this one. In any event they, as we, will have done their best. We should now go forward; we should act; we should act now. I am proud of the committee. I am proud of Secretary Lane. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield my 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. FERRIS. And I yield 30 minutes to him, if the gentleman still insists on it. We hope the gentleman will send something back.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen for their courtesy. I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will have that privilege.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I think it is but fair that I should recite a few facts relative to this legislation. As a member of the Committee on the Public Lands for some eight years and more, I have been participating in the committee's work upon this legislation. I have assisted in reporting the bill out of the committee three times and assisted in passing it through the House. The Senate bill passed twice, and I was on the conference committee for some six months last year, when the conferees finally agreed, and their report was adopted by the House. Then there was an objection made on the ground that there was some particular wording in regard to Alaska. We put "outside of Alaska" in the bill, and the committee struck it out and objection was made, and again a conference was had, and it was agreed upon.

I want to say, generally speaking, that I have been in favor of this legislation. I have given every consideration that a Member of the House could give to the proper adjustment of the mineral-land laws as they related to these methods, and when the conferees agreed, their agreement carried out, generally speaking, the judgment of those who had given a great deal of consideration to this particular legislation.

When the Congress convened in special session bills were introduced in the House by the distinguished ex-chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS], the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and myself; bills with little difference from the conference report. In the Senate was introduced the bill S. 2775, and reported out, and it passed the Senate with but slight modification, except on the question of making it an entirely leasing bill without any right of ownership as compared with the conference report, and with the addition of a section as to the right of alien ownership, and authorizing the leasing not only of the minerals, which the former bill had provided for, and that exclusively without the surface of the land, but only the mineral deposits, nothing more and nothing less, with the authorization of the Secretary of the Interior to lease the surface when necessary. The Senate bill added "and mineral lands and lands containing such minerals," and, of course, that carried the mineral lands of this character described in the bill as well as the minerals. The Senate placed on the bill sections 40 and 41 and changed the section relating to the disposition of the proceeds.

That bill came before the House Committee on the Public Lands and was considered. The committee amended it, to my mind, as to the general leasing feature and added some splendid amendments to it, and made it more workable and better for the Government, and thus better for the operators, locators, and applicants, because they might know just exactly where their rights were.

With the exception of the alien-ownership feature, the question of the distribution of the funds, and the question of sections 40 and 41, known as the Harris amendment, and the disposition of the public funds, which is changed now from the bill reported three times from the committee to the House and which passed the House and was adopted twice in conference reports, the committee report is now an entire change in the disposition of the money coming from the sale of these lands and minerals, upon which I can not concur.

The rest of the bill, I believe, provides a good way to dispose of the public mineral lands. While it has been asserted—I do not believe that assertion is founded upon all the facts—that the mineral laws were not applicable to the disposition of the mineral lands, of course there have been some valuable oil deposits discovered on worthless lands, and then some desired to obtain the lands, and it became a contest between private individuals, and then a contest between the Government and private individual claimants, that the claim did not comply with every particular letter of the law. That, then, brought about the question of whether or not we would go from the right to dispose of the land to the individual, title in fee, or whether we would have a leasing system.

Now, that is practically all there is in this bill. As to the question of getting revenue for the Government, there is practically no more provision here to obtain revenue to the National Government, so far as the National Government is concerned, than there is under the laws as they exist at the present time.

Now, here is a peculiar thing—and I do not say it for the purpose of criticism, but I think I ought to refer to it. I have here a "confidential" print of the Committee on Public Lands. That means "confidential" to the committee and to the House for their use. In that print the committee amended the Senate bill, and as you make all reports, those amendments ought to have been specified in the report, to the end that the House might act upon each amendment individually and see whether or not they should be adopted or rejected. After the bill was gone through with, at the last end, the committee, in their wisdom and judgment—by a majority, of course, always—said, "Now, we will strike out all after the enacting clause and put in this substitute." Now, that avoided an affirmative vote upon the committee amendment and put it in as a substitute, and now you have the same thing back. A man has to offer an amendment and get an affirmative vote on it, whereas before each amendment that the committee put in, or each amendment by which they struck out anything, required an affirmative vote from the floor of the House, or the committee, before it could become a part of the bill.

Then the rule came in, and until the question was asked, the rule said that we could only discuss the provisions of the substitute and not of the bill. Of course, it does not affect the merits, but it makes its status in the House somewhat complicated and a little difficult to anyone who might be opposed to any of the amendments or who desired to place an amendment in the bill. I take the stand that where you have a larger number of votes everything helps to pass the thing along nicely. I want the committee to understand distinctly that I am not opposed to this legislation, but have been a strong proponent of it; but there are amendments that ought to be placed upon this bill, and in my feeble way I will try to present those amendments to the committee.

The committee can see by comparing the bill that section after section of the substitute is identical with the Senate bill, without the change of the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," but we have substituted the whole thing.

The first amendment is on the question of leasing the mineral deposits and the land, which I think is all right. I think we ought to lease the minerals and the land containing such minerals.

The first amendment placed on the bill in the Senate is—

Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products; or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

The House committee struck out that provision and added a provision never enacted in any of the laws that I have been able to run across. That provision is this:

Provided further, That citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to citizens or corporations of this country shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this act.

I wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that up to the present time, in all our legislation with reference to the public lands, we have never permitted alien ownership of our lands or minerals of any character in the first instance. Of course transfers can be made afterward.

Mr. SINNOTT. What does the gentleman mean by "in the first instance"?

Mr. RAKER. No alien can obtain or acquire ownership in the public domain of the United States as the law now stands.

Mr. SINNOTT. They can by virtue of corporate stock ownership.

Mr. RAKER. No; they can not.

Mr. SINNOTT. I call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. RAKER. I have the authority here.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman's attention was called to the fact, and the specific statute was read to him.

Mr. RAKER. I have that here, and I still say that is not the law and never has been, and it ought never to be.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Does not the law regarding mining locations provide that the privilege of such location shall be granted to citizens of the United States or to those who have declared their intention to become such?

Mr. RAKER. I think not. I think it is limited to citizens——

Mr. VAILE. And those who have declared their intention to become such?

Mr. RAKER. I think not.

Mr. VAILE. I think the gentleman will find he is misinformed.

Mr. RAKER. That may be so. I happen to be unfortunate in not having my book before me.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will permit an interruption there——

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. SINNOTT. I call his attention to the statute which permits alien stock ownership at the present time.

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. SINNOTT. This matter was submitted to Judge Finney, of the board of appeals, and he writes me as follows—and it is on the other matter that the gentleman is contending that no alien corporation could get any ownership——

Mr. RAKER. I do still contend that.

Mr. SINNOTT. Judge Finney writes me as follows:

The section of the Revised Statutes which shows that corporations are entitled to locate and enter mining claims is section 2321. The Supreme Court of the United States in McKinley v. Wheeler (130 U. S., 630) squarely held that a corporation organized under the laws of one of the States is competent to locate or join in the location of a mining claim on the public lands. The ruling of the department that a domestic corporation whose stockholders may be largely aliens is nevertheless entitled to acquire title to mining land is found in 28 L. D., 178.

Mr. RAKER. Exactly. I have that same memorandum in my hand and I remember when it was presented to the committee, and I still say, without fear of successful contradiction, that no alien or alien corporation under any of the public-land laws up to the present time, mineral or otherwise, is permitted to acquire ownership in the public domain of the United States.

Now, there is an instance, and it has been used to some extent, where a man who had filed his first papers as a declarant could file on a homestead, but he never could make his final proof or receive his patent until his final papers had been issued and he was a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield there for a brief question?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. So that the matter may be cleared up?

Mr. RAKER. Surely.

Mr. SINNOTT. Of course, the gentleman is not contending that aliens are permitted to lease under this bill, is he?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. SINNOTT. That matter is clear, that only a citizen of the United States may secure a lease.

Mr. RAKER. Or a corporation.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not want the House to be befuddled on that.

Mr. RAKER. No. They will not be befuddled when I make my statement on it. Now, this provision in the Senate bill prohibited aliens acquiring large interests, say 95 per cent of all the leaseholding interests in the oil of this country, as it stands to-day. This Senate provision prohibited and does prohibit aliens acquiring this stock ownership and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to require the certificate of stock to show these matters and keep this oil in the country.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Senate provision prohibited an alien from acquiring stock?

Mr. RAKER. No. I said no alien shall by stock ownership or otherwise acquire any interest in oil except under the specific provision in the oil lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. That provision is that they may under the Senate bill acquire such interest.

Mr. RAKER. Sure; but that prohibits and prevents exportation of the oil. If a man wants to come and participate in this country in the development of oil, extracting the oil from the bowels of the earth, he ought not to be permitted, under the circumstances of the oil situation, to obtain at least 95 or 98 per cent of the oil for the use in this country to be leased under this bill and then transport the oil somewhere else.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understood the gentleman to convey the impression to the House that the Senate provision prohibited the transportation of oil from this country?

Mr. RAKER. No; it does not; it puts it in the discretion of the President——

Mr. SINNOTT. The matter rests with the President, and until the President acts, until he puts an embargo, or until the Secretary of the Interior directs that the oil shall be consumed in this country, it may be transported abroad?

Mr. RAKER. That is in the provision, and it gives us the protection we ought to have.

Now, in addition to what I have said, under the public-land laws a lease of one claim, or one claim only, can be obtained by a domestic corporation. That is the only instance where they can obtain title to public land. As the law now stands to-day, that must be a domestic corporation. In a land decision they held that the stockholders might be aliens, but not directors, and only in one instance could a corporation obtain a title.

What does this bill do? This bill opens up to corporations in this country every bit of the oil land undeveloped, every bit of phosphate land, every bit of sodium land in this country to-day. So we have gone beyond the limit.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. In regard to the restrictions of alien stockholders in corporations in America getting an interest in oil land, that restriction the gentleman speaks of refers only to the initial application by the corporation. After the corporation acquires the right any alien can purchase any stock he pleases. Is not that true?

Mr. RAKER. I am discussing—and I will make it plain—that corporations can not obtain title to public domain, domestic or otherwise, save and except in one instance, where they can obtain one claim of coal land. No alien up to the present time has ever been able to acquire public domain; but when the title in fee has been transferred to an individual, there is no law or restriction that he can not sell it to an alien. He sells it to anybody that he pleases.

Mr. ELSTON. After the initial claim has been patented, aliens can buy if they please?

Mr. RAKER. Everybody knows that there is no restriction on alienage when a man gets a title in fee. But I am talking about the public domain; I am talking about the Government changing its entire policy and authorizing corporations, 95 or 98 per cent of whom may be aliens, obtaining title under this bill. There is no question about it, no use in denying it. You can organize a corporation of three citizens and 97 aliens and acquire oil lands under this bill. The Senate provision stepped in and said that if the stockholders were aliens the President could say, "I will take it over and you can not transport it." It ought to be so.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that the provisions of the House amendment would permit a corporation 98 per cent of which was alien, Japanese aliens, to acquire some valuable mineral, oil, or phosphate lands in California?

Mr. RAKER. Sure. It will do this: Three American citizens in California and the rest Japanese or Chinese can form a corporation and obtain leases on these lands, where they could not do it now.

Mr. WALSH. In the initial instance?

Mr. RAKER. In the first instance; and obtain Government lease. Let us make that plain. If this bill obtains, they can absorb practically all of the oil interests of this country, because there is no limitation upon the title that the corporation may hold or who shall be its stockholders.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Having acquired the fee, is there any statute of the State of California that would prohibit them from transferring it to other aliens?

Mr. RAKER. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. WALSH. Having acquired the fee to this land—such a corporation as the gentleman describes—is there any local law of the State of California which would prohibit it from conveying that fee to other aliens in that State?

Mr. RAKER. It is my impression that the present alien land-ownership law in California would prohibit that transfer.

Mr. WALSH. But there is no Federal statute to that effect?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? No lease can be transferred under this act without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. But the gentleman did not say anything about a lease. I am answering questions and not assuming something.

Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. SINNOTT, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado rose.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, just a minute; one at a time. I yield to my colleague from California first and then I will yield to the other gentlemen.

Mr. BARBOUR. The question I was about to ask has probbaly been answered by the information brought out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]—that is, as to the restrictions, under the California alien land law, on Japanese owning and leasing lands in that State. I think the answer of the gentleman from California to the gentleman from Massachusetts threw some light on that.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman agrees with me?

Mr. BARBOUR. Under the alien land law of California, as I understand it, a corporation composed of 97 per cent, as I understand the percentage to be, of Japanese could not take title to land in that State; and, furthermore, they could not take a lease under the alien land laws for more than three years.

Mr. RAKER. But that was not the gentleman's question as he put it to me. He stated it when the corporation obtained the title.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In fee.

Mr. RAKER. Which was an American corporation, although all of the stockholders except three and all the directors of which except three were aliens—whether that corporation could transfer its title to other aliens.

Mr. BARBOUR. Under the California alien land law they could not transfer to Japanese, though they might to English or French.

Mr. RAKER. They can not if they are individuals, but this is a corporation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that under the House amendment a corporation composed of 98 per cent of aliens can acquire fee to this land?

Mr. RAKER. No; they can not acquire the fee.

Mr. WALSH. Then what is the danger?

Mr. RAKER. They get the right to the lease, and can dispose of its products and send the oil where they please.

Mr. WALSH. But they can acquire the lease?

Mr. RAKER. They can acquire the lease. That is the point. Having a lease of the land, all of our phosphate, all of our sodium, all of our borax, all of our oil, all of our coal, 95 per cent of them being aliens, they could, under the bill without any restrictions send it abroad if they wanted to; and why should there not be some control placed upon that if there is alien ownership in the lease—I mean under the stock ownership—and that this provision of the Senate bill should remain in the bill instead of the House provision?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman speaks about this corporation being composed of Japanese and Chinese. I do not know but what the question I have in mind has already been answered by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BARBOUR], but the question I want to ask is whether or not the laws of California permit such a corporation to be organized, to become a citizen of the State, with a majority ownership in these aliens?

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is, and my understanding is now—and I want to appeal to my colleague from California [Mr. BARBOUR] to that effect—that that is the one imperfection in the alien land law of California to-day, that a corporation of Japanese aliens can acquire title to lands in California, and we have been trying to amend that act. There was a provision of that kind up last year, but telegrams were sent from somewhere to somewhere and the bill was withdrawn, but 99 per cent of the people of California are anxious to amend that law.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is such a corporation organized under the laws of the State of California with a majority of stockholders aliens under that law a citizen of the State of California?

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is that it is.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BARBOUR. My recollection of the alien land law is that any corporation the majority of the stock of which is held by aliens who can not become citizens—in other words, Japanese, for that is what is meant—can not acquire title to land in the State of California, nor can it acquire a lease for a longer peried than for three years.

Mr. RAKER. They are acquiring it, but just under what technicality at this time I would not like to state.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. As a matter of fact, under the Senate provision, which the gentleman seems to prefer, corporations having 90 per cent of alien control of stock ownership can acquire a lease?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. The only restriction on such a corporation obtaining a lease under this act is that it subjects itself to the possibility of an embargo, if the President decides to lay it, upon the exportation of their products. Is not that true?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Is that in the House bill?

Mr. ELSTON. No; that is in the Senate draft. It permits the alien ownership the gentleman speaks of, except that it provides that the President, under certain conditions, may lay an embargo upon the product. I will ask the gentleman this:

The House provision provides the same thing, except a reciprocal arrangement by which any foreign country, where Americans are permitted to the full extent in the way of production, the same privilege shall be granted to the nationals of those countries in this country. There is reserved always the right to Congress, on the representation of the President, to lay an embargo on exports at any time, which can be invoked in case of an emergency.

Mr. RAKER. I have called the attention of the committee to the House provision of the bill; but after you have acquired 90 per cent of all the oil lands in the country, stock ownership of which is alien, those leases run practically ad libitum, ad infinitum, forever, if they comply with the rules and regulations.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman contends here that the Senate bill does one thing and the House bill another, and there seems to be some confusion about it. Can the gentleman give the committee the section involved?

Mr. RAKER. I have read both of them, and they are in my remarks.

Mr. CARTER. What are the numbers of the sections?

Mr. RAKER. Section 1 of the Senate bill and section 1 of the substitute House bill, and the House provision is found on page 39 of the substitute. Here is what I am getting at. It says:

That citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny—

And so forth. In other words, we can not legislate for our own people; we can not legislate for ourselves; we can not legislate to protect our own oils, our own phosphates, and our own coal; but we have to wait and depend upon whether another country shall permit like ownership. There is not any reason, there is not any justice, in it; and while the Senate provision does not go as far as I would like it to go, there ought not to be any lease where there is any stock ownership——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment when I finish this—stock ownership of aliens in our natural resources such as oil, coal, phosphates, and sodium. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand that the gentleman concedes that the statement of his colleague from California [Mr. ELSTON] is correct?

Mr. RAKER. Part of it, but he did not get clear through.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is in favor of that? Is the gentleman in favor of the plan which is authorized under his interpretation of the Senate bill?

Mr. RAKER. In reference to imposing an embargo——

Mr. WALSH. Permitting these aliens to hold these leases?

Mr. RAKER. Why, no; but I can not get any more.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is going to offer some amendments, I understand.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but I will have to take the best I can get in this House. It has been offered repeatedly and I failed several times in the committee in getting a majority vote to prohibit alien stock ownership as is the California law and as it ought to be.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman can offer an amendment to the House substitute to cover what he desires?

Mr. RAKER. I can do a good many things, but I see it would be foolish and useless, because I know beforehand how much good that does. No matter how good or just the proposition may be you can get nowhere unless you have the votes. Is not that right? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman is correct in his interpretation of these two measures, and has sound reason for denouncing their provisions in the vigorous manner in which he has done, I submit that he ought to try to remedy it in the committee and suggest some restrictions that he would like to see placed in it.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to my colleague from Massachusetts I have fully presented that matter, and again repeat that I did not have the votes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has not repeated it here, nobody knows——

Mr. RAKER. I did not get the votes in the committee and I would not get them upon the floor of the House, and I am going to take as much as I can get and hope that the Senate amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. But this is a different membership that the gentleman is trying to operate upon than the one he had before, and if the gentleman will only submit the remedy it should receive some consideration.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman in reference to its being a different membership, I think the gentleman will observe that the House too often follows the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. WALSH. That might be because somebody was a little fearful the gentleman's persuasive eloquence might succeed in disintegrating this bill that has been offered.

Mr. RAKER. It is very delightful for the gentleman to say that.

Mr. WALSH. But I would like to hear the gentleman's proposition as to how he would cure the manifest impropriety which is contained in both propositions of permitting aliens to control these lands.

Mr. RAKER. I can tell the gentleman——

Mr. WALSH. I would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. It can be done by an amendment here prohibiting leases to aliens. It can be done by prohibiting leases to aliens that have any stock ownership belonging or owned by aliens, and though this bill changes the fundamental principle of our public-land laws, we still can put a provision in here that if any stock ownership is held by aliens that within so many months the Attorney General shall commence an action to forfeit the stock to the United States Government just like we have done in a dozen bills that have been passed here in regard to title going to certain parties or individuals, that after they were held a certain length of time that they should be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman of the opinion that this important public interest has reached such a stage that it can not be developed unless we pass legislation to permit aliens to come in and acquire leases or ownership?

Mr. RAKER. No. Let me tell the gentleman something——

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I will.

Mr. RAKER. All right, sir; does the gentleman know—I do not like to state what occurred before the committee—no; I am going to withdraw that; I am not going to state that.

Mr. WALSH. I am very sorry I am not going to be told.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman will not be told, because under the rules of the House a man can not tell what occurs in a committee; that is all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not just at this time.

That is enough for that. I am going on to the other two matters—on the question of sections 40 and 41 of the Senate bill. Section 40 of the Senate bill reads as follows. Now, I want to get this to the House:

SEC. 40. That section 7 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"No stockholder of any corporation or any association engaged in commerce and producing or refining petroleum, or any of the by-products thereof, shall acquire or control, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of any other corporation or association so engaged, when both of such corporations or associations have been created or formed in compliance with a decree or judgment of dissolution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, or in avoidance of a prosecution previously initiated under the provisions of this act or the antitrust laws. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not less than six months."

That is known as the Harris amendment to the Senate bill, for the purpose of relieving the unjust and illegal conditions now existing in regard to the handling and disposition of the products of oil, to prevent this disintegrated corporation that was dissolved by the United States Supreme Court from owning and controlling and practically dominating the oil markets of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. The 40 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have read to the House a letter from Senator HARRIS on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the rule, and is in control of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and the Chair has no jurisdiction. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, in one aspect all of the mineral lands of the United States are either withdrawn lands or unwithdrawn lands. As to the present right of anyone to go on the unwithdrawn lands, it is practically unlimited. A man can go on and aggregate his claims to an almost unlimited extent, and when he discovers mineral he is entitled to a patent on the whole thing. As to withdrawn lands, except as to those who went on the lands prior to withdrawal, he can do nothing. We have had a relation here by the chairman as to how much the withdrawn lands amount to. Those withdrawn lands are supposed to contain minerals. Nobody knows whether they do or not. Take the 6,000,000 acres of supposed oil lands; not more than 50,000 acres, approximately, have ever been shown to contain any oil, so that practically 6,000,000 acres still remain of wildcat territory. We are not permitting anybody under this act to go out and explore or exploit any public domain containing known riches. We are giving an opportunity to our own citizens to explore over 5,000,000 acres of possible oil territory which nobody can positively say contains oil. We are sending them out to risk failure, because the statistics show that 90 per cent of the men who sink wells in wildcat territory lose their money. All we are doing in this withdrawn area in regard to oil is to say, "Go forth and find, and if you find you can not do what you can do now—take the whole thing. If you find, we, representing the Government, will take one-eighth of the whole production and anything more that we desire." One-eighth I take as the ordinary commercial royalty. That is the minimum royalty the Government may take; as to maximum royalty the sky is the limit. You are permitting them to go out into the Government domain and find out whether there is value, and if they find it the Government gets the "velvet."

The House committee has struck from the Senate bill a feature which might be objectionable to the House. The Senate bill says, "Go forth and find, and the royalty which the Government will exact will be not less than one-eighth and not more than one-fourth." We have struck out the maximum, leaving the minimum not less than one-eighth, and the maximum may be as high as the traffic will bear. The Government can take the whole thing if it chooses.

I want to bring this fact before the House, that the first time in the history of conservation legislation we have now a pure leasing bill. As to all these millions and millions of acres of the public domain, no patent under the act is given to a single individual. The absolute ownership is always in the Government and the Government receives its royalty. That, in the main, is the administrative feature which the Government has adopted with regard to mineral deposits. I spoke before as to certain withdrawn areas and certain claimants having been on those withdrawn areas in full enjoyment of their rights at the time the withdrawals were made. It has been recognized by the Government that those claimants had a perfect right to go on the land; that they were in lawful prosecutions of discoveries at the time the withdrawals were made; that in some instances they have made discoveries. When these withdrawals were made they were advised by counsel that the withdrawals were illegal. Several district courts in the West decided in their favor, which fortified their course with regard to spending millions and millions of dollars in the prosecution of the work. Finally the matter got up to the Supreme Court, and it was held that the withdrawals were valid. Thereupon these claimants were placed in a position where they had spent millions of dollars, produced a great deal of oil after an immense amount of work, and found themselves involved in litigation with the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman give me two minutes more?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will yield to the gentleman another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. ELSTON. The major part of the lands in California are practically out of consideration by reason of favorable decisions rendered in favor of the claimants by the Federal courts.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I regret I can not yield. I have only a minute. The Government in the settlement of the disputed California and Wyoming claims permits the claimants to come in and relinquish their claims, taking one-eighth royalty on all past production and a royalty on all future production limited only by the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. In the naval reserves this right is limited to the producing wells only, and the remainder of the claim is subject to disposition by the President under such terms as he may prescribe. This is certainly a most favorable settlement for the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested here several times in this discussion that we are now entering upon a departure from our former policy in relation to the public lands. I want to indicate in a way what that departure is, and I want also to emphasize the point that we entered upon this departure 16 or 18 years ago, along about the beginning of President Roosevelt's administration, and that our entrance upon that departure at that time was the reason why a large part of this country is now forced to be content with a leasing policy and is asking for a leasing bill, instead of for the retention of the former system.

I do not know exactly what the reason was for the policy which prevailed for a very short time after the inception of our Government in connection with the holding of public lands as the absolute property of the Government. At all events that policy was very early abandoned. Possibly the motive for that policy is indicated by a curious report which I find was submitted to the House of Representatives by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, in 1834, from the Committee on the Public Lands, explaining why the public lands were regarded as the property of the Government. In that report he says, speaking of our debts to domestic creditors and to foreign countries:

> The inducements to cessions, held out by Congress to those States having western territory, were to aid in supplying the means of extinguishing the national debt created by the War of the Revolution, and "to promote the harmony of the Union," and "the stability of the general confederacy." On the one hand, it seems to have been considered not only desirable to obtain means of payment but to gain the confidence of the public creditors, by appearing to possess them.

But he argues in this report for a reduction in the price of public lands. It may be instructive to refer back to the very wise words of a wise man some 85 years ago, when he said in this report of his committee to Congress:

> The high price of land inevitably retards the population of a country, and, taken in connection with the want of power to tax it, must postpone the maturity of its resources.

> In the opinion of the committee, it is due to the people of the new States that the existing state of things should be terminated as soon as practicable. It is certainly desirable that every acre of land should, if possible, be rendered productive; and this can never be done till it is in the hands of individual proprietors. Population is emphatically the strength of a State; and to render a people free, prosperous, and happy, they should be the owners of the soil they cultivate.

That doctrine prevailed virtually from the time that report was submitted to Congress, or very soon afterwards, by the adoption of the preemption law of 1841, until the Roosevelt administration. You gentlemen have doubtless read, until the matter seems a commonplace of history, of the tide of immigration which poured West under the stimulus of this doctrine. In the late thirties Federal troops were employed to keep people off the public lands, but finally the plowshare proved more potent than the bayonet. In 1866 that policy, as part of the permanent policy of the Government, was extended to mining claims, allowing the acquisition of title by individuals who entered upon the land and developed it and made it productive.

That policy remained unbroken, as I said, until a few years ago, when, by the system of withdrawal of lands from entry and by harassing the entries which had been made, and by the attempt to cancel not only entries but patents, it became increasingly difficult and finally almost impossible to acquire title to the public lands.

As an instance of this we have the spectacle, now presented, of the mining prospector being regarded almost as a criminal. When he starts to make a location, in a forest reserve, for example, he must conclusively prove that he is innocent or else he is presumed to be attempting to perpetrate a fraud on the Government. I have in my office a number of files representing instances of cancellation of entries made in the best of good faith and followed by hard labor, the investment of considerable capital, and the performance of annual assessments by the locator. In one such case the situation is presented of one who located mining ground as a placer and was refused a patent for the assigned reason that it should have been located as a lode, although on appeal the land office expressed the opinion that, under the evidence, the ground was properly subject to entry as placer ground, but that it did not desire to depart from previous rulings of the department in that respect. No injury could possibly come to the Government from allowing the placer location. A lode location confers greater rights upon the locator than a placer location, and it would seem that the refusal of patent in this case was a highly technical ruling intended to deprive the locator of rights initiated in good faith under the laws of the United States. In recent years and to this day in the oil fields we have presented to us the spectacle of the Government's agent following the oil prospector, who, by his own enterprise or insight or geological skill, has located oil discoveries. The agent represents a Government which has expended no money in drilling holes or making geological investigations, but as soon as the man who has done those things strikes oil the agent of the Government renders a report and immediately thereafter the Government causes all the surrounding land to be withdrawn from entry.

The principle that the United States was a trustee of the public lands, holding the title temporarily for the use and benefit of those who might later convert the property to a beneficial use, at which time the title could be established in those performing such development, has been repeatedly declared and reffirmed by our Supreme Court, and it is based on fundamental conceptions of land ownership which have been a part of the political conscience of English-speaking peoples since the days of the Magna Charta.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. VAILE. If it should be my fortune, gentlemen of the House, to be sent here for a few more terms, I expect to stand before you urging a return to the principle which we have lately disregarded and which we are now abandoning—a return to the individual of the right to secure title to public land.

And I expect that that proposition will then be eagerly and enthusiastically supported by a Congress which will have become convinced by actual experience that a Federal feudalism has no place in our theory of government, that absentee landlordism is not rendered more beneficent because the Government is the landlord, and that the individual thrift and energy which peopled and developed our country from the Alleghenies to the Pacific are best preserved by encouraging individual ownership of land. This was a truth perceived by Mr. Clay and the patriots of his time as far back as 1834. It was the light which guided our footsteps to national greatness. It is obscured now by the clouds of national ownership, but I believe that light is only hidden and not extinguished.

Let me, in closing, leave with you this further thought: The lands heretofore acquired under the laws of the United States are not to be regarded as public lands. The lands involved, for instance, in section 18 of this bill, are lands to which title has been established or on which claim of title is made by virtue of locations authorized by our present laws. And I desire to call your attention to the nature of these titles, a point which has now grown hazy to people living in States where public-land questions never existed or have long since gone out of existence, but entirely familiar to people in all of our States known as the "public-land States." For purposes of ownership, the possessory title has practically all the incidents of a fee; it is, indeed, a fee title, subject only to forfeiture or defeasance by abandonment or by failure to perform conditions exacted by the Government for its continuance. These conditions vary according to the nature of the property, but involve improvement and either constant or periodical occupation. For example, a mining claim located under the laws of the United States, as they have heretofore existed, is a freehold. It descends to a man's heirs; it can be sold at execution in settlement of his debts; it can be conveyed, subject, indeed, to certain restrictions, but with practical freedom for all ordinary business purposes. It is important that this point should not be overlooked in dealing with lands embraced within the provisions of the present leasing bill. Do not consider the relief sections of this bill as if you were dealing with Government lands. These claims are not in any sense public lands; they are private lands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is my purpose during the time allotted to me to endeavor to tell you something about the conditions that have confronted the oil men of California and Wyoming during the past 10 years, the conditions that this legislation now before the House is intended to relieve.

The history of that situation is in a way bound up with the laws and the decisions of the courts during the past 10 years.

Prior to the year 1897 there had been no law passed by Congress under which a locator could make an entry upon oil land and perfect his claim. In the year 1897 Congress enacted a statute which provided that the locator on oil or gas lands should make his location and his entry and prove up on his land under the provisions of the placer-mining law. This situation continued for a great many years, and thousands of acres of land in the West were located under the placer law. Corners were marked, boundaries were laid out, notices were posted and recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which the land was situated. The locators built roads on these lands, put up buildings, constructed reservoirs, and brought water in many cases for many miles, sunk their wells, made their discoveries, and were then entitled to their patents. The oil locators during that time, operating under the placer-mining laws, had certain vested rights in their locations so long as they complied with the law. The courts had recognized the doctrine that a bona fide entryman, faithfully and diligently prosecuting the work of development on his claim, had a vested property right in his location.

With that condition existing, and with many thousands of acres entered under the placer-mining laws in the West, suddenly and without any warning or notice whatsoever, on the 27th day of September, 1909, President Taft issued his now famous withdrawal order. This order recited that, in aid of proposed legislation affecting the use and disposition of the petroleum deposits on the public domain, the lands enumerated therein were temporarily withdrawn from all form of entry under mineral or nonmineral public-land laws.

But the withdrawal order contained this saving clause:

> All locations and claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after full investigation and examination.

You can perhaps realize something of the consternation and uncertainty that this order created among the oil men. Immediately the oil locators, who had not fully perfected their claims and had not received patents, sought legal advice; and almost unanimously the lawyers of the West—among them some of the best mining lawyers in the United States—advised these oil men, who had been operating under the placer-mining laws, that they were absolutely safe in proceeding with their work.

While the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States against Midwest Oil Co., later decided that the presidential withdrawal order was binding and effective, the lower Federal courts rendered decisions in accordance with the opinions given to the locators by their attorneys.

District Judge Dooling held, in the suit of the United States against Midway Northern Oil Co., that the power to dispose of the public lands was expressly conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, and that no power was by that instrument conferred upon the President in derogation of the power given to Congress. The circuit court of appeals, in Consolidated Mutual Oil Co. against United States, held that the saving clause in the withdrawal order directly applied to lands held by the locators at the time of the order, and who were at that time in good faith developing the same.

In deciding the case of United States against Midwest Oil Co., the Supreme Court was divided. Justices Day, McKenna, and Van Devanter dissented. Justice McReynolds did not sit. The majority opinion held that, while the decision was not based upon the question as to whether the President originally had the power to withdraw public lands from entry, owing to long-continued practice acquiesced in by Congress, the presumption was raised that the Congress had given its consent to such withdrawals. In the dissenting opinion Justice Day laid down the rule that the Constitution vests in Congress the power to dispose of public lands, and this implies the exclusion of all other power or authority over such lands. Furthermore it was declared that Congress having expressly subjected these lands to the placer-mining laws, and authorized their location, entry, and purchase thereunder, the executive power to withdraw lands in some cases did not attach in this case.

Some of the locators, relying upon the advice of counsel and upon the decisions of the lower courts, proceeded with the work of development. Others, fearing further losses, refrained from proceeding until their legal status could be determined.

In 1910 Congress passed the Pickett Act. The purpose of this legislation was to give statutory authority for withdrawals and to relieve the situation created by former withdrawals. The Pickett Act contained the provision that the rights of any persons who, at the date of any withdrawal previously or thereafter made, were bona fide occupants or claimants of oil or gas bearing lands, and who, at such date, were in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery, should not be affected by such order so long as such claimants or occupants should continue in the diligent prosecution of such work. Under this legislation the oil men believed that their interests were to be protected, and a feeling of relief went over the oil fields of California and Wyoming.

But relief did not come. The Government filed many suits against operators to compel a forfeiture of their lands. It was alleged that the locators had no rights, that discovery had not been made prior to withdrawal, that work was not being diligently prosecuted at the time of withdrawal, that the claimants did not continue to diligently prosecute the work of development. Injunctions were prayed for and receivers asked. The Government was in the anomalous position of attacking locators for obeying the very order the Government sought to enforce.

Practically all of these cases that have reached a decision have been decided against the Government and in favor of the claimants. The courts have held that the Pickett Act gave a legal status to good-faith claimants who, at the date of the act, were in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery.

The oil men of California and Wyoming, who are not looters of the public domain, but who are as honest and patriotic American citizens as can anywhere be found, have waited for 10 years for relief from these unwarranted conditions. This legislation will settle their status for all time, will enable the adjustment of litigation now pending, will guarantee vested rights, increase production of oil which is now so badly needed, and for all time end a campaign of interference on the part of the Government. This bill does not grant to the oil men all that they would desire, but it does grant them relief from an intolerable situation, and to such relief they are by every right entitled.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HADLEY having taken the chair as speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdiction, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. HITCHCOCK as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. SHEPPARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

MINING OF COAL, OIL, PHOSPHATE, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I feel somewhat humiliated that we should be compelled to become practically inarticulate upon a bill of this importance. We spent three days discussing the budget bill that everybody agreed to. We took up the time in political discussions, comments, criticisms upon public men, and now we devote to this most important measure a miserable two hours. [Applause.] Yet this bill amends the Senate bill out of existence. Let me read the title: "To promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain." It might better be called a bill to surrender the coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain to the Coal Trust and the Standard Oil Co. If you want the proof of that, look at sections 40 and 41, which were aimed at those trusts, and which you have cut out of the bill.

Section 40 prevents interlocking or community ownership in more than one of the corporate units into which a trust has been broken up by a court judgment of dissolution or where the trust has been dissolved to avoid prosecution. This is a highly commendable provision in the Senate bill. Please tell us why it has been omitted in the House substitute?

Section 41 regulates and controls the price of petroleum or any by-product thereof. It is aimed to prevent the Standard Oil subsidiary companies from discriminating against consumers in different sections of the country. I would like to have the committee explain why they have eliminated from the bill that very obvious safeguard. If the Senate language was deemed inadequate, why was not the language amended and the idea preserved?

Why should the United States Government give up its rights in oil or in coal to private ownership at all? If the leases would go to individual citizens for honest development and competition, I would not object, but you know where those rights will go. The oil rights are going to be taken up by the Standard Oil Co. and the coal rights will go to a few men who have brought about a condition in this country in which we are almost faced with revolution. The Coal Trust and the Oil Trust are largely responsible for the conditions which prevail in this country to-day. Yet here we are surrendering our rights to them, with hardly a protest. Your committee comes in, practically unanimous. No time is given to the other side. Is there any other side in this House?

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does not the gentleman know that no coal company can get more than one lease in a State under this bill? That being so, why does the gentleman say that we are surrendering the coal lands to the Coal Trust?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman know that the Standard Oil Co. is permitted to have only one corporation, but that since its dissolution by the courts it has divided up into a score of corporations?

Here are a few of them, showing their capitalization and the amounts of their surplus.

Standard Oil subsidiaries.

Leading companies.	Capital.	Surplus.
Atlantic Refining	$5,000,000	$50,952,881
Ohio Oil	15,000,000	63,839,643
Prairie Oil & Gas	18,000,000	70,435,441
Solar Refining	2,000,000	3,861,465
Standard Oil of Indiana	30,000,000	87,509,465
Standard Oil of Kansas	2,000,000	4,295,555
Standard Oil of New Jersey (common)	98,338,382	468,712,409
Standard Oil of New York	75,000,000	110,028,634
Standard Oil of Ohio	7,000,000	12,507,184
Vacuum Oil	15,000,000	43,546,799

This will give some idea of the stock dividend possibilities of these companies. Most of them have in contemplation increases in their capitalization which will enlarge the sphere of their speculative operations. Among the companies just mentioned two of them have carried out this purpose. The Atlantic Refining Co. has increased its capital from $5,000,000 to $50,000,000. The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has raised its capital from $30,000,000 to $100,000,000. Some of the smaller subsidiary companies have also joined in the grand rush for investors' money. The Continental Oil Co. has raised its capital from $3,000,000 to $18,000,000. The Standard Oil Co. of Nebraska has increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000, and the Mid-West Refining Co. has increased its capital to $50,000,000.

HOW OIL PROFITS ARE JUGGLED.

The Federal Trade Commission, of which Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, was then chairman, made a report to the President, under date of April 17, 1917, upon the price of gasoline, in which we find this very illuminating statement—page 107:

> The rates of dividends are based on investment, not on capital stock. The Standard companies being undercapitalized, the rates actually paid on stock were higher than the rates on investment. The rate of dividends paid on investment varied considerably, ranging from nothing up to as high as 62.6 per cent. The average rate was 7 per cent. In the case of the three Standard marketing concerns the average dividend was 9.5 per cent, the Standard of Nebraska actually paying 13.4 per cent. On the other hand, the small Pennsylvania refiners, except one, made but a poor showing.
> Indeed, the additions to surplus made during 1915 have to be considered carefully in judging the profitableness of the refiners' operations. Thus the Atlantic Refining Co. only paid 3.9 per cent on its investment as of the beginning of the year, but over 80 per cent of its net earnings went into its surplus.

This well illustrates the method of juggling with its finances resorted to by this stupendous organization, with its many ramifying branches, to defraud its stockholders in order to put at the disposal of the few men who control its affairs vast surpluses to enable them to venture into and control banks and industries of every kind throughout the country.

SIXTEEN PERSONS CONTROL PRICES.

After a thorough investigation the Federal Trade Commission found that about 52 per cent of all the stock of all the Standard Oil companies was owned by about 16 persons, and that 70 per cent of all stock of all the oil companies was owned by one group. In other words, there has been found to be a community of stock holding in all of the subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Co. Nominally, they are separate companies, incorporated under the laws of different States; but 70 per cent of their stock is held by the same interests; united, notwithstanding the dissolution of the original Standard Oil Trust, in an invisible but nevertheless powerful bond of unity.

WHAT IS IN ISSUE?

The public lands proposed to be thrown open to the public under the measure before us embrace the most valuable coal and oil lands in the world. They embrace from 25 to 90 per cent of the areas of many of our Western States. These lands were withdrawn from public entry by President Taft on September 27, 1909, to conserve the mineral and oil wealth of the country for future generations. The fear was then well grounded that if not withdrawn they would be gobbled up by greedy speculators, who would exploit them for their own aggrandizement and against the public weal. That menace still exists and, if anything, it is even more accentuated. I am willing that these lands should be once more opened to public entry; but if that is done the measure providing for it should properly safeguard the interests of all the people. As the Senate bill came over to us I believe those safeguards were provided. The bill passed the Senate with only one dissenting vote. It would not have passed at all without sections 40 and 41, which our House Committee on the Public Lands has seen fit to eliminate. The House substitute bill before us throws the doors wide open to the Coal Trust and the Oil Trust.

The amount and value of these lands stagger the imagination—6,500,000 acres of possible oil lands, 2,700,000 acres of phosphate lands, 3,500,000 acres of oil-shale lands, and 70,000,000 acres of coal lands.

If this bill is passed, to whom do you suppose they will go? Not to the average citizen, but to the large corporations which are already in the field. They alone have the capital and the organization to possess themselves of and profitably exploit this tremendous acreage.

MOST PERFECT TRUST IN EXISTENCE.

Gentlemen profess to be confident that there is no danger to be apprehended from the Standard Oil Co. in the monopolization of these lands. If that is true, why put ourselves at its mercy? If there is any doubt, let us at least be on the safe side. But such blind faith in the future betrays foolish contentment or gross ignorance of the past. We know that the Standard Oil can no more change its character than the leopard can change his spots. Ida M. Tarbell, in her "History of the Standard Oil Co.," published in 1904, said:

It is the most perfectly developed trust in existence; that is, it satisfies most nearly the trust ideal of entire control of the commodity in which it deals. Its vast profits have led its officers into various allied interests, such as railroads, shipping, gas, copper, iron, steel, as well as into banks and trust companies, and to acquiring and solidifying of these interests it has applied the methods used in building up the Oil Trust. It has led in the struggle against legislation directed against combinations. Its power in State and Federal Government, in the press, in the college, in the pulpit, is generally recognized.

The same spirit that moved it then actuates it to-day.

John D. Rockefeller, jr., in an address on trusts to the students of Brown University said:

The American Beauty rose can be produced in its splendor and fragrance only by sacrificing the early buds which grow up around it.

In other words, all competitors must die.

TRUST DID NOT LOWER PRICE OF OIL.

Since this bill has been under discussion I have heard it whispered that even if this bill should open the door wider to the Standard Oil Co. it would not be such a bad thing. That it is a beneficent trust, for did it not lower the price of oil to the consumer? To those gentlemen I would say, "Please read what Miss Tarbell has to say on that subject":

As a result of the Standard's power over prices, not only does the consumer pay more for oil where competition has not reached or has been killed but this power is used steadily and with consummate skill to make it hard for men to compete in any branch of the oil business. This history has been but a rehearsal of the operations practiced by the Standard Oil Co. to get rid of competition. It was to get rid of competition that the South Improvement Co. was formed. It was to get rid of competition that the oil-carrying railroads were bullied or persuaded or bribed into unjust discriminations. It was to get rid of competition that the Empire Transportation Co., one of the finest transportation companies ever built up in this country, was wrested from the hands of the men who had developed it. It was to get rid of competition that war was made on the Tidewater Pipe Line, the Crescent Pipe Line, the United States Pipe Line, not to mention a number of similar smaller enterprises. It was to get rid of competition that the Standard's spy system was built up; its oil wars instituted; all its perfect methods for making it hard for rivals to do business developed.

GULLIBLE PEOPLE STILL LIVE.

The most curious feature, perhaps, of this question of the Standard Oil Co. and the price of oil is that there are still people who believe that the Standard has made oil cheap. Men look at this chart and recall that back in the late sixties and seventies they paid 50 and 60 cents a gallon for oil, which now they pay 12 and 15 cents for. This, then, they say, is the result of the combination. Mr. Rockefeller himself pointed out this great difference in prices. "In 1861," he told the New York Senate committee, "oil sold for 64 cents a gallon, and now (1900) it is 6¼ cents." The comparison is as misleading as it was meant to be. In 1861 there was not a railway into the oil regions. It cost from $3 to $10 to get a barrel of oil to shipping point. None of the appliances of transportation or storage had been devised. The process of refining was still crude, and there was great waste in the oil. Besides, the markets were undeveloped. Mr. Rockefeller should have noted that oil fell from 61¼ in 1861 to 25¾ in the year he first took hold of it, and that by his first successful manipulation it went up to 30. He should point out what the successive declines in prices since that day were due to—to the seaboard pipe lines, to the development of by-products, to bulk instead of barrel transportation, to innumerable small economies. People who point to the differences in price, and call it combination, have never studied the price-line history in hand. They do not know the meaning of the variation of the line; that it was forced down from 1866 to 1876, when Mr. Rockefeller's first effective combination was secured by competition, and driven up in 1876 and 1877 by the stopping of competition; that it was driven down from 1877 to 1879 by the union of all sorts of competitive forces—producers, independent refiners, the developing of an independent seaboard pipe line—to a point lower than it had ever been before. They forget that when these opposing forces were overcome, the Standard Oil Co. was at last supreme, for 10 years oil never fell a point below the margin reached by competition in 1879, though frequently it rose above that margin. They forgot that in 1889, when for the first time in 10 years the margin between crude and refined oil began to fall, it was the competition coming from the rise of American independent interests and the development of foreign oil fields that did it.

To believe that the Standard Oil combination or any other similar aggregation would lower prices except under the pressure of the combination they were trying to kill, argues an amazing gullibility. Human experience long ago taught us that if we allowed a man or group of men autocratic powers in government or church, they used that power to oppress and defraud the public. For centuries the struggle of nations has been to obtain stable government, with fair play to the masses. To obtain this we have hedged our kings and emperors and presidents about with a thousand constitutional restrictions. It has not been possible for us to allow even the church, inspired by religious ideals, to have the full power it has demanded in society. And yet we have here in the United States allowed men practically autocratic powers in commerce. We have allowed them special privileges in transportation, bound in no great length of time to kill their competitors, though the spirit of our laws and of the charters of the transportation lines forbade these privileges.

PRICES IN CONTROL OF SMALL GROUP.

We have allowed them to combine in great interstate aggregations, for which we have provided no form of charter or publicity, although human experience long ago decided that men united in partnerships, companies, or corporations for business purposes must have their powers defined and be subject to a reasonable inspection and publicity. As a natural result of these extraordinary powers, we see, as in the case of the Standard Oil Co., the price of a necessity of life within the control of a group of nine men, as able, as energetic, and as ruthless in business operations as any nine men the world has ever seen combined. They have exercised their power over prices with almost preternatural skill. It has been their most cruel weapon in stifling competition, a sure means of reaping usurious dividends, and, at the same time, a most persuasive argument in hoodwinking the public. (Pp. 227, etc., Tarbell's History of Standard Oil Co.)

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION'S REPORT.

The practice of discrimination in prices and of unfair competition has been consistently adhered to through all the years. In the investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission these charges were sustained. Though the Standard Oil Trust has been adjudged out of existence by the courts, it has divided itself up like a monstrous worm into 12 living vital parts, and to each of these organisms is assigned a definite territory to feed upon and devour. They are as follows: The Standard Oil Cos. in California, Indiana, Kansas, New Jersey, New York, Ohio; the Vacuum Oil Co., Atlantic Refining Co., Solar Refining Co., Galena-Signal Oil Co., Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, and the Magnolia Petroleum Co.

It was found that the Indiana company was selling gasoline in its allotted territory cheaper than the other Standard Oil companies. In Ohio they were selling 2 cents on the gallon higher than in Indiana. In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, and Georgia 5 cents higher, and in Tennessee 3 cents higher than in Indiana. What was the reason for this discrepancy? It had competition, and when its competitors, like the early buds on the rosebush, were killed off, the great American Beauty rose—the Standard Oil Co.—blossomed forth in full beauty and strength and vigor and proceeded to overwhelm the guileless consumer with a resumption of its odoriferous exactions.

CLAYTON ACT HAS FAILED.

In short, we find that the Clayton Act falls short of its purpose. The Standard Oil octopus is both ingenious and ubiquitous. The House Land Committee excuses its elimination of the sections of the Senate bill which were planned to meet this situation by saying that the sections thus struck out were an amendment of the Clayton Act and, as such, were within the domain of the Judiciary Committee. Suppose they were? They were in the Senate act as it came to us. They would not be subject to a point of order. Why has the House committee so framed its report that the sections now become subject to a point of order? The fact is the committee is opposed to these sections. That is why they excluded them, and not because they were afraid of treading on the corns of the Judiciary Committee.

THE REMEDY.

These two sections only follow out the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission (see p. 163 of their report), as follows:

(2) Abolition by legislation in certain cases of common-stock ownership in corporations which have been members of a combination dissolved under the Sherman law. (The several Standard Oil companies.)

(4) Legislation which, while recognizing common ownership, would fix upon such common owners the responsibility for the acts of the several companies so owned, which prevent competition. (Require the Standard companies to all have the same price after allowing charges for selling and transportation.)

This is the legislation called for by a body which has conducted a thorough and painstaking investigation of the subject in all its ramifications. They are not the wild, unbalanced deductions of half-baked philosophers or radicals. They are the suggestions of practical men, and we, as practical men, and as honest men, deeply concerned for the economic prosperity of our country and the welfare of posterity, should retain them unweakened and undisturbed in the measure we are about to pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I should be glad to yield if I had the time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to myself five minutes at this time, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, for many years the West has been earnestly appealing to Congress for some legislation to unlock the many millions of acres of Government withdrawn coal and oil lands and open up that vast public domain to development. This bill in some form has four times passed the House and several times passed the Senate in former sessions, and I regret to say that every bill that has ever heretofore passed has been more liberal to the West than this one. But the active propaganda that has been so constantly carried on for years by the ultraconservationists has made it utterly impossible at this time to secure a more liberal bill than this one. So we of the West are faced with the alternative of continued stagnation in the development of our many millions of acres of coal, oil, oil shale, gas, and phosphate lands or the passage of this bill, which, while extremely stringent in its terms, will nevertheless, I think, release, under drastic restrictions, these millions of acres and bring about a very much needed and wonderfully important development.

The criticism by a few people that this bill is in some respects in the interest of the large operators and contrary to those of the public and the small producers is utterly without any foundation, and those who make it have either never read the bill or are absolutely reckless in their statements.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Why did you not retain the provisions regulating the price which is contained in the Senate bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The amendments that we on the Public Lands Committee have put on this Senate bill make its provisions much more harsh and drastic on price and royalties, and in many other respects, than it was as it passed the Senate.

This bill more completely, in every possible way, protects the rights of the Government and the public, and yet fairly guards the legitimate vested rights of everybody concerned, than any bill on the subject that has ever heretofore passed either branch of Congress. This bill is purely a leasing measure and, practically speaking, does not permit title to pass into private ownership. While probably fully 90 per cent of the people in the public-land States would prefer to see a more liberal land law permitting the securing of patents to lands in order that they might go upon the tax rolls and help bear the burden of maintaining schools, roads, and local government in the counties and States where they are located, yet this bill retains in the Government forever the title to all these lands. The bill limits the acreage of the various kinds of lands which can be acquired by any one individual or corporation to such an extent as to make monopoly impossible, while allowing sufficient acreage to justify development.

Minimum royalties are in each instance prescribed, and the maximum are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who is the guardian of the rights of the Government and of the public. The Secretary may take all of the product, if he desires, and may always reject any and all bids, and may also prescribe by general regulations the operation of the lands leased under this bill so as to not only protect the property but to protect those employed in the operations. It gives him an opportunity to take into consideration the equities of those who in good faith, and without fraud, settled on lands now withdrawn, and allows the President, through agencies designated by him, to settle and compromise matters of controversy over title between bona fide claimants and the Government, thus avoiding very great expense and delay and ruinous litigation.

After years of effort I have succeeded in including in this bill a provision permitting all cities and towns to locate, open up, and operate municipal coal mines free of any charge or royalty. And as probably the largest body of oil shale in the world is in my congressional district I may say that I am very largely chargeable with the responsibility for the provisions of that section of the bill, and while they will not be entirely satisfactory they are many times more liberal than the provisions regarding oil and coal, and are the very best I can possibly obtain after three years of hard work; and I am confident that a marvelous oil-shale development will ultimately be brought about under this bill.

If the bill is passed as reported, 45 per cent of the money received from sales, bonuses, royalties, and rentals, under the provisions of this act, are to be paid directly to the respective States in which they occur; and another 45 per cent goes to the reclamation fund; and 10 per cent to the Government. In common fairness to the States in which these resources are principally located, I hope that provision will not be materially changed.

With the four or five million acres of coal land in Colorado, and the marvelous and almost inconceivable possibilities for oil land and oil shale, the amount thus paid to the State in the near future will be a very large sum annually. So that the people of our State will not only get large benefits from these payments, but the much greater benefits from the activity and value of the development of our resources that have long lain idle because of the lack of adequate laws under which they could be developed.

With 700,000,000 acres of public domain in the Western States and Alaska, with possibly one-tenth of all that land being coal land, of which 29,000,000 has already been classified as coal land, and with fully 7,000,000 acres of oil and oil shale lands, all lying out there in the barren, idle, and undeveloped condition in which they have remained for millions of years, and, practically speaking, not one single acre of all that vast domain of coal and oil land has been allowed to be patented during the past 10 years, owing to the withdrawals and classifications preventing anyone from entering it; and as there is no law under which it can be leased or operated in any businesslike or safe way, all that imperial domain of resources remains undeveloped waiting for Congress to pass some law that will not only permit but we hope encourage its development.

While this bill is not as fair to the Western States as it should be, it is the best we can get. It is a start in the right direction, and it will at least permit, even if it does not very much encourage, a great development throughout the West of these resources that have been hermetically sealed up for all these years.

There are so many stringent and drastic restrictions against combinations and monopolies that the most rabid conservationist need have no fear about the operations of this bill. There can be no monopoly or extortion under this bill. Absolute control of all these resources is always retained by the Government. The leases are strictly limited by acres, by time limit, and by rate of royalty, and are always subject to all kinds of regulations and supervision by the Interior Department. In fact, the Government's rights are everywhere so fully and absolutely guarded and protected that I feel no fair-minded person can justly criticize the bill on account of its possible liberality.

All former bills authorized bona fide claimants under existing laws to have a patent to all, or at least one-fourth, of their lands, while this bill is intended to permit no patents. In other words, this is purely a radical conservation leasing proposition. The West will not be satisfied with this measure, yet we are accepting it with the belief that if it proves impractical we may be able to amend it at future sessions of Congress, and I hope the bill will pass and be given a fair trial.

President Wilson has for five years been very earnestly, repeatedly, and forcibly urging the passage of this measure as a matter of national importance in the development of our resources throughout the West. In his second annual message delivered before Congress in joint session on December 8, 1914, the President said:

> We have year after year debated, without end or conclusion, the best policy to pursue with regard to the use of the ores and forests and water powers of our national domain in the rich States of the West when we should have acted, and they are still locked up. The key is still turned upon them, the door shut fast, at which thousands of vigorous men, full of initiative, knock clamorously for admittance. The water power of our navigable streams outside the national domain also, even in the Eastern States, where we have worked and planned for generations, is still not used as it might be, because we will and we won't; because the laws we have made do not intelligently balance encouragement against restraint. We withhold by regulations.
> I have come to ask you to remedy and correct these mistakes and omissions, even at this short session of a Congress which would certainly seem to have done all the work that could reasonably be expected of it. The time and the circumstances are extraordinary, and so must our efforts be also.
> Fortunately, two great measures, finely conceived, the one to unlock, with proper safeguards, the resources of the national domain, the other to encourage the use of the navigable waters outside that domain for the generation of power, have already passed the House of Representatives, and are ready for immediate consideration and action by the Senate. With the deepest earnestness I urge their prompt passage. In them both we turn our backs upon hesitation and makeshifts and formulate a genuine policy of use and conservation in the best sense of those words. We owe the one measure not only to the people of that great western country for whose free and systematic development, as it seems to me, our legislation has done so little, but also to the people of the Nation as a whole; and we as clearly owe the other in fulfillment of our repeated promises that the water power of the country should in fact as well as in name be put at the disposal of great industries which can make economical and profitable use of it, the rights of the public being adequately guarded the while, and monopoly in the use prevented. To have begun such measures and not completed them would, indeed, mar the record of this great Congress very seriously. I hope and confidently believe that they will be completed.

And again in accepting the renomination, in his address delivered at Long Branch, N. J., on September 2, 1916, President Wilson made the following statement:

> We ought both to husband and develop our natural resources, our mines, our forests, our water power. I wish we could have made more progress than we have made in this vital matter; and I call once more, with the deepest earnestness and solicitude, upon the advocates of a careful and provident conservation, on the one hand, and the advocates of a free and inviting field for private capital, on the other, to get together in a spirit of genuine accommodation and agreement and set this great policy forward at once.

Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of more fully expressing the sentiment of the West on this subject, and also showing the moral, equitable, legal, and constitutional right upon which we are appealing for liberal and fair treatment at the hands of Congress in our efforts to develop the new States of the arid West, I am going to avail myself of the privileges of extending my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by the Hon. Clyde C. Dawson, of Denver, president of the Colorado Bar Association, at its annual meeting on the 11th of July, 1919, at Colorado Springs, Colo. Mr. Dawson is one of the most eminent lawyers our State has ever produced, and is a public-spirited loyal son of the West who has made a profound study of the rightful relations of the Federal Government to our Western States in regard to our public-domain policy and the proper development of our natural resources. His address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF CLYDE C. DAWSON AS PRESIDENT OF THE COLORADO BAR ASSOCIATION.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE TIMES.

The tendency of recent years has been for the Federal Government to encroach upon that of the States and for the executive department of the Federal Government to encroach upon all other departments. This is fast leading to a bureaucracy centered in Washington reaching out for the permanent domination of innumerable great activities heretofore left to the States and to individual initiative.

This all makes for a breaking down of our constitutional form of government and the substitution therefor of a form of governmental socialism controlling the great means of transportation, communication, and even production. The advocates of this new theory of government are not confined to any one political party, to any section of the country, or to any single class of people.

The question may well be asked whether the form of government under which we have developed from a few million people scattered along the eastern coast to a Nation of over a hundred million people—a form of government under which we have lived so happily and prospered so marvelously—should be abandoned or even mutilated for the purpose of embarking upon this new experiment, and whether the experience and traditions of the past should be set aside because certain people say the new must be better than the old, the untried better than the tried.

In the consideration of this question let me first disclaim any thought of criticism of the extension of either Federal or Executive power for purely war purposes. It may be taken for granted that every loyal American was willing, for the period of the war, to strengthen the arm of the Federal Executive and the power of the Nation itself in any and every manner that would make for the winning of a conflict in which the very life of civilization itself was at stake; but, happily, the war is now over and we are facing the dawn of a new day. Are we to go forward into this new day, and those that are to follow, as a Nation living under the terms of that great document which the illustrious Gladstone characterized as "the most wonderful work struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man," or are we to countenance and possibly abet those tendencies which are seeking to break down the limitations contained in that charter of our liberties?

I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Constitution is to be considered as absolutely fixed for all time. A method for its change is found within its own terms. That method has in the past proved workable, notwithstanding the claims of impatient reformers that it was too slow and cumbersome, failing to recognize that government is essentially a matter of slow growth.

The Constitution may contain limitations that should now, or at some future time, be changed, but all such changes should be approached thoughtfully, carefully, and prayerfully. As was said by that great lawyer and statesman, Elihu Root:

"The system of limitation must be continued if our governmental system is to continue, if we are not to lose the fundamental principles of government upon which our Union is maintained and upon which our race has won the liberty secured by law for which it has stood foremost in the world.

"Lincoln covered this subject in one of his comprehensive statements that can not be quoted too often. He said in the first inaugural:

"'A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinion and sentiment is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does of necessity fly to anarchy or despotism.'"

The statesmen who framed our Constitution were not building for a day, a year, or a generation. They sought to achieve a well-balanced structure, which would stand the strain of time and meet the ever-broadening needs of their posterity. In an effort to avoid the errors that had caused the downfall of many a great and powerful nation, they drew lavishly upon the history of the past and looked far into the future.

The members of the convention were mostly men of vision, understanding, scholarly attainments, and practical wisdom. They had no false notions about the infallibility of the people if left unrestrained by self-imposed constitutional checks and limitations.

They knew that time would bring changes, and that if the document they were framing was to stand the test it must have sufficient resilience and elasticity to adapt itself to the ever-widening activities of a people set upon the subjugation of a wild and untamed continent.

Mr. Madison said:

"In framing a system which we wish to last for ages we must not lose sight of the changes which ages will produce."

Mr. Hamilton said he concurred with Mr. Madison:

"We were now to decide forever the fate of republican government, and if we did not give to that form due stability and wisdom it would be disgraced and lost among ourselves, disgraced and lost to mankind forever."

It will thus be seen that the framers of the Constitution well knew what they were doing and for what time they were building, as did its great interpreter, Chief Justice Marshall, who said:

"A constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as near as mortality can approach it, as far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it is sure to encounter."

It was early urged by those who feared the power of the Supreme Court of the United States that the legislative branch of the Government was itself the judge of the constitutionality of its enactments. In recent years the question is again being raised—not as to the power of the Supreme Court to determine the constitutionality of congressional enactments, but as to the policy of permitting it to do so. And some of our State constitutions have been amended as to deny to the courts the right of declaring acts of the legislature unconstitutional.

It would seem that upon this question the answer of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, setting forth the view upon which our Government has ever since proceeded, should be conclusive, not only as a matter of law, but as a matter of policy. He said:

"The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limit committed to writing, if these limits may at any time be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the Constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it, or that the legislature may alter the Constitution by an ordinary act.

"Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The Constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it. If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act, contrary to the Constitution, is not law; if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power in its own nature illimitable.

"Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently, the theory of every such government must be that an act of the legislature repugnant to the constitution is void. This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and is consequently to be considered by this court as one of the fundamental principles of our society."

While the law is thus settled, the policy of the law in this regard is still under attack by those who chafe at this and other restraints of the Constitution.

There has probably never been a time in our history when our form of government and the traditions that have grown up under it have been subjected to assault from so many different angles as at the present time. This would seem extraordinary with the world just emerging from the chaos in which other forms of government have failed to stand the strain, were it not for the fact that the spirit of anarchy, Bolshevism, and all the milder forms of discontent and disorder are abroad in the world.

The situation is most clearly illustrated by the astounding collapse not only of the Russian Government, but apparently of the Russian people's ability to govern themselves. They have been led into the abyss of disorganization by false prophets and demagogues who, drunk with power, are now seeking to spread their pernicious doctrines throughout the world, and even here in free America their agents are busy, aided and abetted by the discontented and turbulent among our own people.

The discontented ones among us seem either to forget or do not know that never in the history of the world has there been a nation comparable to ours in size, where the people, taken as a whole, have been as well fed, as well clothed, as well housed, as well educated and circumstanced in all that goes to make life worth the living as have the people of the United States.

Never in the world's history has any race of men in a like period of time developed such a vast area of the earth's surface to such a degree of perfection as we have done under that form of government which the discontented now say has outworn its usefulness. They seem to forget how well the Constitution has stood the strain of our mighty growth in population, territory, wealth, and all the innumerable activities of a strong and virile race.

Our Constitution is to-day the oldest form of government in existence. It was many years after our Constitution was adopted that the Government of England was radically [illegible] the King ceased to govern, and "the Crown became the House of Commons"; that the Spanish Government changed; that the German Empire was brought into existence, only to be shattered by the recent war; that United Italy was admitted into the family of nations; that Japan was converted from a despotism to a constitutional monarchy, and that there sits in China a President instead of an Emperor as of old.

In the more than 130 years since the adoption of our Constitution many another government has gone down in utter ruin, unable to stand the strain of internal commotion or assault from without.

Neither in the shock of civil or foreign war have the colors of our Republic ever been lowered in ultimate defeat, nor has our Constitution failed to bear the strain cast upon it.

With such record as this, why should any among us be seeking a change in the fundamentals of our form of government? Who are those seekers, and what would they have, and how would they accomplish it?

(1) PROPOSED GATEWAY AMENDMENTS.

There is a group composed of many elements—good, bad, and indifferent—who would change the present method of amending the Constitution so as to make the process much easier than at present. Amendments to this effect have been many times proposed in Congress. They differ in form, but all have the same purpose. Such amendments have come to be known as "gateway amendments."

It is said that the National Popular Government League, claiming something like 2,000,000 adherents, advocates some form of "gateway amendment" to the Constitution of the United States so as very greatly to facilitate the making of all future amendments to the Constitution. No doubt many of its members favor the general introduction and use of the initiative and referendum and the recall or unseating of judges who declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. For example, Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, says, in the Congressional Directory of April, 1918, that he is:

"President of the National Popular Government League. Advocate of cloture, short ballot, preferential ballot, initiative and referendum, and a gateway constitutional amendment."

From a very interesting published article by Joseph R. Long, professor of law, Washington and Lee University, I learn that there is a society which calls itself a "Committee on the Federal Constitution," which advocates an amendment providing easier modes of amendment to the Constitution than those prescribed in Article V. They propose to carry on a campaign of education in favor of such measure through

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, for many years the West has been earnestly appealing to Congress for some legislation to unlock the many millions of acres of Government withdrawn coal and oil lands and open up that vast public domain to development. The criticism by a few people that this bill is in some respects in the interest of the large operators and contrary to those of the public and the small producers is utterly without any foundation, and those who make it have either never read the bill or are absolutely reckless in their statements.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Why did you not retain the provisions regulating the price which is contained in the Senate bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The amendments that we on the Public Lands Committee have put on this Senate bill make its provisions much more harsh and drastic on price and royalties, and in many other respects, than it was as it passed the Senate.

This bill more completely, in every possible way, protects the rights of the Government and the public, and yet fairly guards the legitimate vested rights of everybody concerned, than any bill on the subject that has ever heretofore passed either branch of Congress. This bill is purely a leasing measure and, practically speaking, does not permit title to pass into private ownership. While probably fully 90 per cent of the people in the public-land States would prefer to see a more liberal land law permitting the securing of patents to lands in order that they might go upon the tax rolls and help bear the burden of maintaining schools, roads, and local government in the counties and States where they are located, yet this bill retains in the Government forever the title to all these lands. The bill limits the acreage of the various kinds of lands which can be acquired by any one individual or corporation to such an extent as to make monopoly impossible, while allowing sufficient acreage to justify development.

Minimum royalties are in each instance prescribed, and the maximum are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who is the guardian of the rights of the Government and of the public. The Secretary may take all of the product, if he desires, and may always reject any and all bids, and may also prescribe by general regulations the operation of the lands leased under this bill so as to not only protect the property but to protect those employed in the operations. It gives him an opportunity to take into consideration the equities of those who in good faith, and without fraud, settled on lands now withdrawn, and allows the President, through agencies designated by him, to settle and compromise matters of controversy over title between bona fide claimants and the Government, thus avoiding very great expense and delay and ruinous litigation.

After years of effort I have succeeded in including in this bill a provision permitting all cities and towns to locate, open up, and operate municipal coal mines free of any charge or royalty. And as probably the largest body of oil shale in the world is in my congressional district I may say that I am very largely chargeable with the responsibility for the provisions of that section of the bill, and while they will not be entirely satisfactory they are many times more liberal than the provisions regarding oil and coal, and are the very best I can possibly obtain after three years of hard work; and I am confident that a marvelous oil-shale development will ultimately be brought about under this bill.

If the bill is passed as reported, 45 per cent of the money received from sales, bonuses, royalties, and rentals, under the provisions of this act, are to be paid directly to the respective States in which they occur; and another 45 per cent goes to the reclamation fund; and 10 per cent to the Government. In common fairness to the States in which these resources are principally located, I hope that provision will not be materially changed.

With the four or five million acres of coal land in Colorado, and the marvelous and almost inconceivable possibilities for oil land and oil shale, the amount thus paid to the State in the near future will be a very large sum annually. So that the people of our State will not only get large benefits from these payments, but the much greater benefits from the activity and value of the development of our resources that have long lain idle because of the lack of adequate laws under which they could be developed.

With 700,000,000 acres of public domain in the Western States and Alaska, with possibly one-tenth of all that land being coal land, of which 29,000,000 has already been classified as coal land, and with fully 7,000,000 acres of oil and oil shale lands, all lying out there in the barren, idle, and undeveloped condition in which they have remained for millions of years, and, practically speaking, not one single acre of all that vast domain of coal and oil land has been allowed to be patented during the past 10 years, owing to the withdrawals and classifications preventing anyone from entering it; and as there is no law under which it can be leased or operated in any businesslike or safe way, all that imperial domain of resources remains undeveloped waiting for Congress to pass some law that will not only permit but we hope encourage its development.

While this bill is not as fair to the Western States as it should be, it is the best we can get. It is a start in the right direction, and it will at least permit, even if it does not very much encourage, a great development throughout the West of these resources that have been hermetically sealed up for all these years.

There are so many stringent and drastic restrictions against combinations and monopolies that the most rabid conservationist need have no fear about the operations of this bill. There can be no monopoly or extortion under this bill. Absolute control of all these resources is always retained by the Government. The leases are strictly limited by acres, by time limit, and by rate of royalty, and are always subject to all kinds of regulations and supervision by the Interior Department. In fact, the Government's rights are everywhere so fully and absolutely guarded and protected that I feel no fair-minded person can justly criticize the bill on account of its possible liberality.

All former bills authorized bona fide claimants under existing laws to have a patent to all, or at least one-fourth, of their lands, while this bill is intended to permit no patents. In other words, this is purely a radical conservation leasing proposition. The West will not be satisfied with this measure, yet we are accepting it with the belief that if it proves impractical we may be able to amend it at future sessions of Congress, and I hope the bill will pass and be given a fair trial.

President Wilson has for five years been very earnestly, repeatedly, and forcibly urging the passage of this measure as a matter of national importance in the development of our resources throughout the West. In his second annual message delivered before Congress in joint session on December 8, 1914, the President said:

> We have year after year debated, without end or conclusion, the best policy to pursue with regard to the use of the ores and forests and water powers of our national domain in the rich States of the West when we should have acted; and they are still locked up. The key is still turned upon them, the door shut fast, at which thousands of vigorous men, full of initiative, knock clamorously for admittance. The water power of our navigable streams outside the national domain also, even in the Eastern States, where we have worked and planned for generations, is still not used as it might be, because we will and we won't; because the laws we have made do not intelligently balance encouragement against restraint. We withhold by regulations.
> I have come to ask you to remedy and correct these mistakes and omissions, even at this short session of a Congress which would certainly seem to have done all the work that could reasonably be expected of it. The time and the circumstances are extraordinary, and so must our efforts be also.
> Fortunately, two great measures, finely conceived, the one to unlock, with proper safeguards, the resources of the national domain, the other to encourage the use of the navigable waters outside that domain for the generation of power, have already passed the House of Representatives, and are ready for immediate consideration and action by the Senate. With the deepest earnestness I urge their prompt passage. In them both we turn our backs upon hesitation and makeshifts and formulate a genuine policy of use and conservation in the best sense of those words. We owe the one measure not only to the people of that great western country for whose free and systematic development, as it seems to me, our legislation has done so little, but also to the people of the Nation as a whole; and we as clearly owe the other in fulfillment of our repeated promises that the water power of the country should in fact as well as in name be put at the disposal of great industries which can make economical and profitable use of it, the rights of the public being adequately guarded the while, and monopoly in the use prevented. To have begun such measures and not completed them would, indeed, mar the record of this great Congress very seriously. I hope and confidently believe that they will be completed.

And again in accepting the renomination, in his address delivered at Long Branch, N. J., on September 2, 1916, President Wilson made the following statement:

> We ought both to husband and develop our natural resources, our mines, our forests, our water power. I wish we could have made more progress than we have made in this vital matter; and I call once more, with the deepest earnestness and solicitude, upon the advocates of a careful and provident conservation, on the one hand, and the advocates of a free and inviting field for private capital, on the other, to get together in a spirit of genuine accommodation and agreement and set this great policy forward at once.

Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of more fully expressing the sentiment of the West on this subject, and also showing the moral, equitable, legal, and constitutional right upon which we are appealing for liberal and fair treatment at the hands of Congress in our efforts to develop the new States of the arid West, I am going to avail myself of the privileges of extending my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by the Hon. Clyde C. Dawson, of Denver, president of the Colorado Bar Association, at its annual meeting on the 11th of July, 1919, at Colorado Springs, Colo. Mr. Dawson is one of the most eminent lawyers our State has ever produced, and is a public-spirited loyal son of the West who has made a profound study of the rightful relations of the Federal Government to our Western States in regard to our public-domain policy and the proper development of our natural resources. His address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF CLYDE C. DAWSON AS PRESIDENT OF THE COLORADO BAR ASSOCIATION.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE TIMES.

The tendency of recent years has been for the Federal Government to encroach upon that of the States and for the executive department of the Federal Government to encroach upon all other departments. This is fast leading to a bureaucracy centered in Washington reaching out for the permanent domination of innumerable great activities heretofore left to the States and to individual initiative.

This all makes for a breaking down of our constitutional form of government and the substitution therefor of a form of governmental socialism controlling the great means of transportation, communication, and even production. The advocates of this new theory of government are not confined to any one political party, to any section of the country, or to any single class of people.

The question may well be asked whether the form of government under which we have developed from a few million people scattered along the eastern coast to a Nation of over a hundred million people—a form of government under which we have lived so happily and prospered so marvelously—should be abandoned or even mutilated for the purpose of embarking upon this new experiment, and whether the experience and traditions of the past should be set aside because certain people say the new must be better than the old, the untried better than the tried.

In the consideration of this question let me first disclaim any thought of criticism of the extension of either Federal or Executive power for purely war purposes. It may be taken for granted that every loyal American was willing, for the period of the war, to strengthen the arm of the Federal Executive and the power of the Nation itself in any and every manner that would make for the winning of a conflict in which the very life of civilization itself was at stake; but, happily, the war is now over and we are facing the dawn of a new day. Are we to go forward into this new day, and those that are to follow, as a Nation living under the terms of that great document which the illustrious Gladstone characterized as "the most wonderful work struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man," or are we to countenance and possibly abet those tendencies which are seeking to break down the limitations contained in that charter of our liberties?

I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Constitution is to be considered as absolutely fixed for all time. A method for its change is found within its own terms. That method has in the past proved workable, notwithstanding the claims of impatient reformers that it was too slow and cumbersome, failing to recognize that government is essentially a matter of slow growth.

The Constitution may contain limitations that should now, or at some future time, be changed, but all such changes should be approached thoughtfully, carefully, and prayerfully. As was said by that great lawyer and statesman, Elihu Root:

"The system of limitation must be continued if our governmental system is to continue, if we are not to lose the fundamental principles of government upon which our Union is maintained and upon which our race has won the liberty secured by law for which it has stood foremost in the world.

"Lincoln covered this subject in one of his comprehensive statements that can not be quoted too often. He said in the first inaugural:

"'A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinion and sentiment is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does of necessity fly to anarchy or despotism.'"

The statesmen who framed our Constitution were not building for a day, a year, or a generation. They sought to achieve a well-balanced structure, which would stand the strain of time and meet the ever-broadening needs of their posterity. In an effort to avoid the errors that had caused the downfall of many a great and powerful nation, they drew lavishly upon the history of the past and looked far into the future.

The members of the convention were mostly men of vision, understanding, scholarly attainments, and practical wisdom. They had no false notions about the infallibility of the people if left unrestrained by self-imposed constitutional checks and limitations.

They knew that time would bring changes, and that if the document they were framing was to stand the test it must have sufficient resilience and elasticity to adapt itself to the ever-widening activities of a people set upon the subjugation of a wild and untamed continent.

Mr. Madison said:

"In framing a system which we wish to last for ages we must not lose sight of the changes which ages will produce."

Mr. Hamilton said he concurred with Mr. Madison:

"We were now to decide forever the fate of republican government, and if we did not give to that form due stability and wisdom it would be disgraced and lost among ourselves, disgraced and lost to mankind forever."

It will thus be seen that the framers of the Constitution well knew what they were doing and for what time they were building, as did its great interpreter, Chief Justice Marshall, who said:

"A constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as near as mortality can approach it, as far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it is sure to encounter."

It was early urged by those who feared the power of the Supreme Court of the United States that the legislative branch of the Government was itself the judge of the constitutionality of its enactments. In recent years the question is again being raised—not as to the power of the Supreme Court to determine the constitutionality of congressional enactments, but as to the policy of permitting it to do so. And some of our State constitutions have been amended as to deny to the courts the right of declaring acts of the legislature unconstitutional.

It would seem that upon this question the answer of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, setting forth the view upon which our Government has ever since proceeded, should be conclusive, not only as a matter of law, but as a matter of policy. He said:

"The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limit committed to writing, if these limits may at any time be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the Constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it, or that the legislature may alter the Constitution by an ordinary act.

"Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The Constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it. If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act, contrary to the Constitution, is not law; if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power in its own nature illimitable.

"Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently, the theory of every such government must be that an act of the legislature repugnant to the constitution is void. This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and is consequently to be considered by this court as one of the fundamental principles of our society."

While the law is thus settled, the policy of the law in this regard is still under attack by those who chafe at this and other restraints of the Constitution.

There has probably never been a time in our history when our form of government and the traditions that have grown up under it have been subjected to assault from so many different angles as at the present time. This would seem extraordinary with the world just emerging from the chaos in which other forms of government have failed to stand the strain, were it not for the fact that the spirit of anarchy, Bolshevism, and all the milder forms of discontent and disorder are abroad in the world.

The situation is most clearly illustrated by the astounding collapse not only of the Russian Government, but apparently of the Russian people's ability to govern themselves. They have been led into the abyss of disorganization by false prophets and demagogues who, drunk with power, are now seeking to spread their pernicious doctrines throughout the world, and even here in free America their agents are busy, aided and abetted by the discontented and turbulent among our own people.

The discontented ones among us seem either to forget or do not know that never in the history of the world has there been a nation comparable to ours in size, where the people, taken as a whole, have been as well fed, as well clothed, as well housed, as well educated and circumstanced in all that goes to make life worth the living as have the people of the United States.

Never in the world's history has any race of men in a like period of time developed such a vast area of the earth's surface to such a degree of perfection as we have done under that form of government which the discontented now say has outworn its usefulness. They seem to forget how well the Constitution has stood the strain of our mighty growth in population, territory, wealth, and all the innumerable activities of a strong and virile race.

Our Constitution is to-day the oldest form of government in existence. It was many years after our Constitution was adopted that the Government of England was radically [illegible] King ceased to govern, and "the Crown became the House of Commons"; that the Spanish Government changed; that the German Empire was brought into existence, only to be shattered by the recent war; that United Italy was admitted into the family of nations; that Japan was converted from a despotism to a constitutional monarchy, and that there sits in China a President instead of an Emperor as of old.

In the more than 130 years since the adoption of our Constitution many another government has gone down in utter ruin, unable to stand the strain of internal commotion or assault from without.

Neither in the shock of civil or foreign war have the colors of our Republic ever been lowered in ultimate defeat, nor has our Constitution failed to bear the strain cast upon it.

With such record as this, why should any among us be seeking a change in the fundamentals of our form of government? Who are those seekers, and what would they have, and how would they accomplish it?

(1) PROPOSED GATEWAY AMENDMENTS.

There is a group composed of many elements—good, bad, and indifferent—who would change the present method of amending the Constitution so as to make the process much easier than at present. Amendments to this effect have been many times proposed in Congress. They differ in form, but all have the same purpose. Such amendments have come to be known as "gateway amendments."

It is said that the National Popular Government League, claiming something like 2,000,000 adherents, advocates some form of "gateway amendment" to the Constitution of the United States so as very greatly to facilitate the making of all future amendments to the Constitution. No doubt many of its members favor the general introduction and use of the initiative and referendum and the recall or unseating of judges who declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. For example, Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, says, in the Congressional Directory of April, 1918, that he is:

"President of the National Popular Government League. Advocate of cloture, short ballot, preferential ballot, initiative and referendum, and a gateway constitutional amendment."

From a very interesting published article by Joseph R. Long, professor of law, Washington and Lee University, I learn that there is a society which calls itself a "Committee on the Federal Constitution," which advocates an amendment providing easier modes of amendment to the Constitution than those prescribed in Article V. They propose to carry on a campaign of education in favor of such measure through the daily and periodical press, book and pamphlet publication, letter and circular, pulpit and platform.

I make reference to these associations and committees to show how widespread is the effort to bring about by amendment to Article V of the Constitution a situation whereby the passing notions of the day may be more readily written into the Constitution of the United States. By permission I make use of some of the valuable data contained in the excellent article by Prof. Long.

The theory, of course, upon which this radical change in our fundamental law is being urged is that the Constitution does not now express the real will of the people, and that it is practically unamendable in the modes now provided. It is urged that the people of the United States have not control over their fundamental law at the present time, save in a minor degree. On the contrary, I believe that the Constitution of the United States does in the main express the real will of the people of this country; that the people have control over their fundamental law at the present time, and that the existing provision for amending the Constitution adequately lends itself to the change of our fundamental law whenever a real majority of the people desire to see that law changed; and this belief is based on the history of the Constitution and the amendments thereto.

While the Constitution was still before the people for adoption, numerous proposals for amendments were made by the conventions of seven of the ratifying States, and in the first session of Congress, in 1789, nearly 200 such proposals were introduced. Since that time resolutions proposing amendments have been introduced in one or more of the sessions of practically every Congress.

Of the hundreds of amendments that have been introduced in the two Houses of Congress only 22 have received the required two-thirds vote of both Houses and been submitted to the States, and of the 22 only 18, including the prohibition amendment, have been adopted.

Twelve amendments were proposed by the First Congress, in 1789, and 10 of these were adopted by 1791 as the first 10 amendments. Then followed the eleventh (1798), twelfth (1804), thirteenth (1865), fourteenth (1868), fifteenth (1870), sixteenth (1913), seventeenth (1913), and eighteenth in 1919. Regarding the first 10 amendments as practically a part of the original document, it thus appears that the Constitution has been amended only eight times since its adoption.

From the adoption of the twelfth amendment, in 1804, until 1913, a period of 109 years, there were but three amendments, and these were adopted only as a result of the Civil War. Moreover, for nearly 40 years after the adoption of the war amendments no proposed amendment had succeeded even in passing both Houses of Congress.

It is no doubt due to these facts that many had come to deem the Constitution as practically unamendable. But in 1895 the Supreme Court held the income-tax law of 1894 unconstitutional. This decision was very unpopular, and quickly developed a sentiment in favor of an amendment to the Constitution authorizing the imposition of such a tax, and before the close of the year 1895, in which the decision was rendered, resolutions were introduced in both Houses of Congress proposing such an amendment. From time to time other resolutions to the same end were offered, and in July, 1909, the sixteenth amendment, as we now have it, was passed by both Houses of Congress and submitted to the States, and on February 25, 1913, Secretary of State Knox certified that it had been ratified by the required number of States and was a part of the Constitution.

The seventeenth amendment, providing for the election of Senators by the people, passed the Senate on June 12, 1911, and the House on May 13, 1912, on which day it was submitted by Congress to the States. It received the ratification of the last necessary State on May 9, 1913, and on May 31 became a part of the Constitution. Thus the seventeenth amendment was ratified in four days less than one year from the day on which it was proposed, and in less than four years two independent and unrelated amendments were added to the Constitution. The celerity with which the prohibition amendment was adopted is well known to all.

The action upon these amendments clearly demonstrates that whenever the sentiment of the country has become so crystallized upon any given proposition that a majority of the people of the country really desire to have it incorporated in the Constitution of the United States it can be done, and done as speedily as anything should be done, which is of such vital importance as amending the fundamental law of a great country like this of ours.

The present method of amendment well guards our institutions against what Carl Schurz described as "the dangerous tendency of that impulsive statesmanship which will resort to permanent changes in the Constitution of the State in order to accomplish temporary objects."

Happily the Federal Constitution has so far been a fairly stable document. It has never been revised as a whole and has been changed by amendment in only a few particulars. It has escaped the fate which has overtaken many of our State constitutions, which have been converted from documents stating general and fundamental principles of the law into a conglomeration of such principles embedded in a vast mass of purely legislative matter.

I have taken pains to go to some length in discussing this question of amending the Constitution of the United States for the reason that if such an amendment is adopted, it places in the hands of those ever-active individuals who are insistent upon trying their experiments in government upon the people the ready means to make the trial.

No sooner would an amendment of this kind be written into the Constitution than we should find an active group of propagandists endeavoring to further amend the Constitution so as to provide for Federal legislation under the initiative system, for the referendum upon acts passed by Congress, and for the recall of judges or judicial decisions.

Surely our experience in Colorado, and that of other States which have tried these cure-alls, affords no warrant that they should be written into the Constitution of the United States. They have not yet been given an adequate trial in the lesser field of State action and should not be adopted by the General Government—to which they are much less adapted than to the smaller field of the States—until time and experience have demonstrated beyond any reasonable question their value in the smaller field.

There are many other particulars in which zealous reformers would doubtless seek to amend the Constitution of the United States if the method were made less difficult. The foregoing have only been suggested as illustrative.

I am convinced that reform in our institutions is not so much needed as reform in the standards of citizenship and in the civic ideals and practices of the individual citizen.

Within the year I have been shocked to hear a speaker say to an intelligent audience within this State that the advice of "the Father of his Country" was no longer of importance to the citizens of this generation who had come into a new era, where such advice might be considered as old-fashioned and as having no application to the problems of modern times.

Notwithstanding this extraordinary statement, I beg leave to call attention to Washington's Farewell Address, in which, among other things, he said:

"The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government; but the Constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. * * * Toward the preservation of your Government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual changes from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion."

(2) BUREAUCRACY AS APPLIED TO THE PUBLIC-LAND STATES.

I come now to a discussion of the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the States. This is another method by which our form of government, as established by the Constitution, is being broken down.

I am making no plea for "State rights" in the sense in which that term was used prior to and at the time of the Civil War. I am of the school of thought that believes in a strong Federal Government, and I find no objection to the expansion of Federal power in those matters which concern the welfare of all of the people of the United States. Federal authority is best adapted to the handling of such questions, and therefore the authority for doing so is to be found in the terms of the Constitution itself; but it was never intended by the framers of the Constitution that the Federal authority should interfere with the management of those affairs within the State which are purely local to the people of that State.

From the foundation of our Government until within very recent years it has been conceded as axiomatic that the best results, both for the people of the States and the Nation as a whole, could be obtained by keeping clearly in mind that all things which were local in their nature could best be done and should be done by the States, and that only those things which were general in their nature and for the benefit of the people as a whole should be undertaken and performed by the Federal Government, and that it was of prime importance that the constitutional division of powers as between the States and the Federal Government should be maintained, ever bearing in mind that the Federal Government is one of delegated powers brought into existence by the suffrage and the sufferance of the States and their people, and that all powers not so delegated are reserved to the States and to the people. Those who would now seek to override this distinction necessarily seek to rend the very fabric of the Constitution and the dual system of government established by it.

I trust there are many among us who are old-fashioned enough to believe that this should not be done; that our advancement and accomplishments under true constitutional construction have justified us in saying that for a people such as ours the framers of our Constitution struck upon the best form of government that could be devised.

It is true that Chief Justice Marshall said more than 100 years ago, that:

"In war we are one people. In making peace we are one people. In all commercial relations we are one and the same people."

But he further said, in Gibbons v. Ogden:

"The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all external concerns of the Nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of government."

In No. 32 of the Federalist Hamilton said:

"An entire consolidation of the States into one complete national sovereignty would imply an entire subordination of the parts, and whatever powers might remain in them would be altogether dependent on the general will. But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they before had and which were not by that act exclusively delegated to the United States."

And in No. 14 of the Federalist Mr. Madison said:

"In the first place it is to be remembered that the General Government is not to be charged with the whole power of making and administering laws. Its jurisdiction is limited to certain enumerated objects which concern all the members of the Republic but which are not to be attained by the separate provisions of any. The subordinate governments, which can extend their care to all those other objects which can be separately provided for, will retain their due authority and activity. Were it proposed by the plan of the convention to abolish the governments of the particular States, its adversaries would have some ground for their objection, though it would not be difficult to show that if they were abolished the General Government would be compelled by the principles of self-preservation to reinstate them in their proper jurisdiction."

And in No. 45 he further said:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution of the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite."

In Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (158 U. S., 601, 627) Chief Justice Fuller said:

"In our judgment the construction given to the Constitution by the authors of the Federalist * * * should not and can not be disregarded."

The importance of the States in our scheme of government was not only recognized by the framers of the Constitution, by the Supreme Court of the United States from earliest times, but by the great thinkers of every generation since the adoption of the Constitution.

John Fiske says (Critical Period of American History, 239):

"If the day should ever arrive (which God forbid!) when the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects sent from Washington, and when the self-government of the States shall have been so far lost as that of the departments of France, or even so far as that of the counties of England, on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end, and the hopes that have been built upon it for the future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever."

And that great modern statesman, Elihu Root, has recently said, speaking of the authority which should properly lie in the Federal Government on the one hand and in the States on the other:

"It is of very great importance that both of these authorities, State and National, shall be preserved together, and that the limitations which keep each within its proper province shall be maintained. If the power of the States were to override the power of the Nation, we should ultimately cease to have a Nation and become only a body of really separate although confederated State sovereignties continually forced apart by diverse interests and ultimately quarreling with each other and separating altogether.

"On the other hand, if the power of the Nation were to override that of the States and usurp their functions, we should have this vast country, with its great population inhabiting widely separated regions, differing in climate, in production, in industrial and social interests and ideas, governed in all its local affairs by one all-powerful, central Government at Washington, imposing upon the home life and behavior of each community the opinions and ideas of propriety of distant majorities.

"Not only would this be intolerable and alien to the idea of free self-government but it would be beyond the power of a central government to do directly. Decentralization would be made necessary by the mass of government business to be transacted, and so our separate localities would come to be governed by delegated authority—by proconsuls authorized from Washington to execute the will of the great majority of the whole people.

"No one can doubt that this also would lead by its different route to the separation of our Union.

"Preservation of our dual system of government, carefully restrained in each of its parts by the limitations of the Constitution, has made possible our growth in local self-government and national power in the past, and, so far as we can see, it is essential to the continuance of that government in the future."

This same view was expressed in different words by then Justice Hughes, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an address before the New York Bar Association in 1916. He said:

"If we did not have States we should speedily have to create them. We now have them, with the advantages of historic background, and in meeting the serious questions of local administration we at least have the advantage of ineradicable sentiment and cherished traditions. And we may well congratulate ourselves that the circumstances of the formation of a more perfect Union has given us neither a confederation of States nor a single centralized government, but a nation—and yet a union of States, each autonomous in its local concerns. To preserve the essential elements of this system—without permitting necessary local autonomy to be destroyed by the unwarranted assertion of Federal power, and without allowing State action to throw out of gear the requisite machinery for unity of control in national concerns—demands the most intelligent appreciation of all the facts of our interrelated affairs and far more careful efforts in cooperation than we have hitherto put forth."

With this importance of the States emphasized by the leading thinkers of the country from the days of Hamilton and Madison to the present, it is somewhat startling to find in a recent book the statement that "with marked persistency we are building up a centralized Federal Government, reducing the States to mere nonentities," particularly, when we realize, that the statement is, in large measure, true, especially as applied to the State of Colorado and all of the public-land States, in the welfare of which we at the West have a particular and a personal interest.

The whole tendency of the past 15 years has been for the Federal Government to keep an iron grasp upon all the unappropriated natural resources of the West, the coal, the oil, the phosphate lands, the great potential water powers, and those vast areas, timbered and untimbered, which have been withdrawn as national forests.

In 11 of the Western States there is an aggregate of over 471,000,000 acres of public land. This is more than double the total area of 218,000,000 acres which composed the original 13 States constituting the American Union.

The former liberal land policy of the Government which made possible settlement and development in that great territory lying beyond the Mississippi River has been abandoned, and for years the West has been marking time while awaiting congressional legislation or the slackening of the bureaucratic grip of Washington which would permit of the further development of her natural resources.

There is no one in this enlightened day who objects to true conservation within its proper limits, but there are many who object to that false conservation which has in fact been naught but reservation and has resulted in stagnation throughout the public-land States. Nothing is conserved by withdrawing and reserving from use millions of potential water horsepower; nothing is conserved by tying up perpetually or for long periods of time those things which the people could properly use to advantage.

Every horsepower that runs to waste to-day that might be used represents the destruction of so much coal, oil, or other fuel; and this agency of creating power which might be the means of saving these other destructible agencies can be used over and over again without any loss whatever.

During the 33-year period between 1885 and 1918 only 6,000,000 water horsepower were developed out of a total available amount of over 60,000,000 horsepower.

The United States Geological Survey estimates in excess of 44,000,000 horsepower, or 71 per cent of the total potential available horsepower in the United States, is contained within the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and Nevada, and that of this vast amount but 1,622,021 horsepower, or 3.68 per cent, is now being utilized.

With this statement, gentlemen, you can realize the importance of the attitude of the Federal Government toward this mighty natural resource of the Western States, and it is of vital importance whether legislation is to be had, followed by administrative action, which will permit of the development of this resource, or whether, as in recent years, the dead hand of bureaucracy is to decree that for years and perhaps generations to come this indestructible method of producing great potential energy is to lie idle within the borders of the States where it is found until it can be brought under the absolute and permanent domination of the departments in far distant Washington.

Instead of placing restrictions upon the development of water powers and the laying of a tax upon the same, the Federal Government should be glad to recognize rights of way free of cost, as it did in earlier days, under a more enlightened system, which would encourage the development of every possible horsepower for which use could be found.

In regard to handling the public lands and natural resources of the West three schools of thought have been developed:

First. One based upon the belief that the Federal Government's chief interest should be in the adequate development of all of the natural resources to be found within the borders of all of the States going to make up the Union; that such development can best be secured by a liberal policy as to these lands and natural resources; that the States are able to control the industries and properties which are brought into existence within their borders by the development of such lands or resources, and that the States within which the public lands lie should have the right to have these lands and resources go into private ownership where they would be subject to the taxing power of the State for the purpose of maintaining those agencies of local government which are essential if the State is to maintain its existence.

Those who hold this thought believe that as the older States were developed under a liberal policy as to the lands and resources within their borders, the newer States should not be penalized by different and more rigorous treatment. They believe, as has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, that this is an "indestructible Union composed of indestructible States," and also that "this Union was and is a union of States, equal in power, dignity, and authority." While new States have been admitted to the Union "upon an equal footing with the original States," the Supreme Court has also said that the acts of admission, recognizing their coequal rights, were merely declaratory; also that "equality of constitutional rights and power is the condition of all the States of the Union, old and new"; and, furthermore, that "the constitutional equality of the States is essential to the harmonious operation of the scheme upon which the Republic was organized."

Second. Are those who claim that all the unappropriated lands and resources lying within the public-land States belong to all of the people of the United States and should be administered by the Federal Government for the benefit of all the people, and that, except as to certain classes of land and resources, title should not be parted with by the Federal Government, but that such lands and resources should be indefinitely held and administered by departments and bureaus at the National Capital.

This claim that the lands and resources in the public-land States belong to all of the people is a specious one. They do belong to all of the people who are willing to come into the States where such lands and resources exist and cast their lot with the people of that State, and who acquire, develop, and pay taxes upon said lands and resources; and it has ever been true that any citizen of the country, coming from wherever he might, had the same right to acquire such lands and resources as the citizen within the State where they were located.

It is not true, however, and it was never intended by the framers of the Constitution or by the original States which ceded their wild and waste lands to the Federal Government, that the Federal Government should perpetually hold and administer said lands. It is true that the legal title to the public domain rests in the United States, but that title is simply held in trust with the ultimate object that it shall be transferred to the people who will develop it and thereby make possible the creation and maintenance of independent States of the Union.

It was said in Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1, 49):

"The territory is held by the United States for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several States to be ultimately created out of that territory."

Those of this second school of thought have been responsible for the withdrawal from settlement of immense areas within the Western States.

There have now been withdrawn over 190,000,000 acres under the forest reserve act, and this great domain is administered from Washington by an army of Federal employees. The lands are not subject to State taxation, and yet the Federal Government draws a revenue therefrom by charging the highest price obtainable for the timber growing thereon and for grazing privileges allotted to the citizens of the States within which the reserves are located.

In our own State of Colorado something like 15,000,000 acres of land have been set aside as forest reserves. Some 10,000,000 acres of coal lands within our State have also been relieved from the operation of the laws under which they could formerly be entered, and in many instances have been classified as to price at such an exorbitant figure as to make it impossible for the citizen to purchase and operate them at a profit.

Third. There is a group much larger than you would suspect who would have all these resources of the West which are still under the control of the Federal Government permanently reserved by the Government, and as to such things as water powers, coal lands, phosphate lands, oil lands, and like resources, would embark the Government upon a pretentious scheme of governmental development and operation in competition with its own citizens.

This school of thought is of more or less recent growth, but is active in endeavoring to so change our plan of government as to reverse the old order of leaving everything to be done by the citizen which could be done by him and to have everything done by the Government which by any possibility could be operated under departments and bureaus centered in the National Capital.

A bill was introduced in Congress last winter which sought to establish a $50,000,000 revolving fund to be used by the Federal Government in the development and operation of water powers within the public-land States.

Those of this school of thought do not believe in the statement of Thomas Jefferson wherein he said:

"It is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority."

They would concentrate and consolidate the control and management of the vast public domain, double in area that of the original thirteen States, in the ever-arbitrary hands of the departments and bureaus of Washington, unmindful of the statement of Justice Matthews, of the United States Supreme Court (118 U. S., 356, 369), wherein he said:

"When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power."

I am of those who strongly hold to the line of thought of the first group hereinabove referred to. I believe it more nearly comports with the genius of our institutions, the provisions of our Constitution, and that marked individual initiative of our people which has made it possible for them to subdue this vast continent within so short a period of time.

I do not believe, however, that at any time in the immediate future there is a chance of our returning to the more liberal land policies of earlier days, nor do I believe that there is any immediate danger of the notions espoused by the third group referred to being written upon the statute books of our country.

We are, therefore, in my judgment, confronted with the alternative of suffering the stagnation of the past few years as to the development of the natural resources of the West or of submitting to the establishment of what is commonly designated as the leasing or permit system. I for one have become convinced that it is the part of wisdom to submit on the theory that by such submission we may get some development, and upon the other hand, that the working of the system will prove so inadequate that we shall within a few years be able to convince Congress and the people at large that the system is wrong and that the true theory for the development of our country is that entertained by those of the group first above mentioned.

I have cited these encroachments by the Federal Government upon the rights of the Western States because in a practical sense they come more nearly home to us of the West. We all know, however, of the tremendous growth in Federal activity in all the States of the Union as affecting almost all lines of endeavor. A large part of this was due to the war, and wherever it was necessary or even desirable, it should meet with no criticism from any patriotic American.

But there is a large and persistent element in the country carrying on an active propaganda to retain under Federal control practically all those agencies which it was deemed necessary to control for the purpose of effectually conducting the war. They would thus encroach both upon the constitutional rights of the States and of the individual. They menace our constitutional form of Government by seeking to impair and destroy the autonomy of the States, and to establish a semisocialistic paternalism supported by the crutch of bureaucracy for its administration.

Bureaucracy and efficiency never went together under a democratic form of government. It may be possible under an autocratic régime. Nor did paternalism and liberty ever travel as yokemates; they pull in opposite directions.

We have been preeminently a nation of individualists, and with all our faults that has been our strength. It is the most outstanding thing in our history and fundamentally it was the underlying reason for our boys in France showing, with but a few months' preparation, that they, man for man, were the equals if not the superiors of any other soldiers in the world.

As was recently well said, it would be a tragedy if, while our boys were fighting for liberty in France, we should permit the splendid structure of our own ordered and enlightened freedom to be undermined by that most insidious foe of liberty—paternalism, with its allies and close relatives, bureaucracy and socialism.

As stated by a distinguished western Senator:

"It may be possible to devise some system of government more deadening to individual initiative, more destructive to human progress, more burdensome to the people than a bureaucracy, but so far God, in His infinite mercy, has not permitted it to curse the human family."

The menace is a real one. Bureaucracy has ever grown by what it feeds upon. This was pointed out by that eminent statesman, Daniel Webster, as early as 1837, and that more modern statesman, James G. Blaine, said:

"There is nothing of which a public officer can be so easily persuaded as to the enlarged jurisdiction which pertains to his office. If the officer be of bold mind, he arrogates power for purposes of ambition; and even with timid men power is often assumed as a measure of protection and defense."

I have had occasion to be in the city of Washington much in the past 10 years, and I have ever marveled at the increase of departments, bureaus, and boards of the Federal Government, and still more have I marveled at the growth of a board or bureau after once brought into existence.

The personnel of many of these is above reproach. It is made up of delightful gentlemen, happily employed, but the system is that of which I complain. Added force is given to this complaint, because there is an increasing tendency on the part of all department heads and bureaus to insist that legislation conferring powers upon the respective departments and bureaus should grant wide discretionary power to departmental and bureau chiefs.

The evil of such a situation was well covered by a statement contained in an address by then Justice Hughes, wherein he said:

"There is also apparent at times the tendency in a desire for the play of administrative discretion, to preserve opportunities for arbitrary action without responsibility. The requirement of a fair hearing, of action upon evidence, of a disclosure of the basis of action that all parties interested may have suitable opportunity to challenge it, in no way trammels the just administrator who is loyal to the standards of democracy, but are very important safeguards against the development of bureaucratic despotism under democratic forms."

And in the words of Senator Root:

"Unlimited official power concentrated in one person is despotism, and it is only by carefully observed and jealously maintained limitations upon the power of every public officer that the workings of free institutions can be continued."

I have never been able to bring myself to believe that everybody should work for the Government, and if they did, I have been constrained to wonder where would be found the taxpayers to support the army of Federal employees.

Take, for instance, the Department of Agriculture. In a recent work by Henry Litchfield West, of the District of Columbia, it is stated that in 1894, the division of botany in the Department of Agriculture cost $8,600 per annum, while 20 years later the appropriations for the Bureau of Plant Industry aggregated over $2,000,000. The expenditures of the Bureau of Forestry increased during the same period from $7,280 to considerably in excess of $5,000,000. The Bureau of Chemistry, a comparatively new creation, spends $1,000,000 a year.

There are scores upon scores of bureaus in connection with the 11 departments of government, and Government inspectors or officials of various kinds now number thousands, where a few years ago they could be counted by the score. And as Mr. West aptly says:

"In view of this it is impossible not to recall the fact that one of the complaints against King George III in the Declaration of Independence was in these words:

"'He has erected a multitude of new offices and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out our substance.'

"Ten years ago official figures obtained from the Government departments, not including the War and Navy Departments, showed that the President directly controlled appointments which paid salaries amounting to approximately $20,000,000 a year. Since that time the number of Federal officers has been so greatly increased as a natural accompaniment of the growth of Federal power that the total is now of appalling magnitude.

"Statistics compiled by the Civil Service Commission show that on June 30, 1917, the number of officers and employees in the Federal civil service was 517,805. Excluding employees who are within the scope of competitive examination, or who are laborers engaged in Panama Canal work and elsewhere, as well as mail contractors, there were on the date mentioned 125,129 persons who came within the presidential power of appointment or were directly or indirectly named by heads of departments selected by the President. The annual salaries paid to these appointed employees would certainly aggregate a quarter of a billion dollars."

Ours is a large country and necessarily must do things in a large way. No one would have them done otherwise, but we should recognize that the tendency of every department is to magnify its own importance, to reach out for larger appropriations and the employment of more people. This tendency should be held in check. It would comport with both economy and justice to reduce the number employed and raise the pay of many who do not receive adequate compensation.

(3) REVOLUTIONARY METHODS PROPOSED.

The attacks upon our constitutional form of government which I have been discussing pursue established methods and can only be met by convincing a majority of the people that the aims sought by their advocates would not make for the welfare or betterment of the people as a whole.

There is, however, another group, composed of many elements, that seeks by direct action to overthrow our form of government. It is made up of the Bolsheviki, the I. W. W., the revolutionary socialists, and all those who preach that doctrine of discontent which can be satisfied only by the utter destruction of the present order of things as established by our constitutional form of government. These people are the followers of and the would-be imitators of the leaders of the Bolsheviki in Russia, whose high-handed outrages have brought that great people to the very abyss of despair and who now seek to envelop the whole world with the red pall of anarchy.

It will not do for us to sit idly by, nursing the fatuous belief that the United States is so far removed in miles, in thought, education, and traditions as to make us safe from their unholy activities. Who shall set the limit to the ambitions of such men as Lenin and Trotski?

In a very interesting article by the editor of the Constitutional Review is collected much information as to their activities. It is stated that a recent dispatch from London advises that:

"The Russian Bolshevik government for a long time has been organizing an extensive propaganda for revolution in China, India, and Persia, and is now ready, as soon as the opportunity offers, to send agents with large sums of money to stir up trouble throughout Asia."

It may seem that such activities are a long way from America, but we have ample evidence that their propaganda is being scattered broadcast in this country, and it finds fertile soil among the I. W. W. and those of like character within our midst.

In the article above referred to it is said that the State Socialist Convention in Illinois demands that the American Government shall immediately recognize the Bolshevik government of Russia. The State Socialist Convention in Minnesota adopts resolutions indorsing the policies of the Russian Bolsheviki. The State Socialist Convention in New York "greets with joy and confidence the Russian Soviet Socialist Federated Republic, the first socialist republic in the world." And the Pennsylvania State Socialist Convention cables to Lenin and his associates: "Your achievement is our inspiration."

And let it not be forgotten that in spite of the withdrawal from the Socialist Party of many men who could not stomach such utterances as those quoted, the Socialist Party grew enormously during the war. The Russian propaganda is in our midst and is actively at work.

It was recently boasted by one of their leaders that the money sent to Berlin to finance the revolution was as nothing compared to the funds transmitted to New York for the purpose of spreading Bolshevism in the United States.

A witness before the Senate committee described a meeting in the Chicago Coliseum, where an audience cheered the names of Lenin and Trotski for five minutes and also every comment by speakers to the effect that America would be the next nation to adopt the soviet system of government.

But the climax of audacity was reached while I was in the city of Washington, when one of the largest theaters, within sight of the Capitol and within a stone's throw of the White House, was packed with those who enthusiastically cheered speakers devoting themselves to the praise of Bolshevism in preference to the American system of democracy. Our institutions and form of government were the subject of pointed disparagement, and the principal speaker at the meeting declared that the people would want a soviet system instituted in America when it was seen how admirably it worked.

The incident last referred to aroused a storm of popular and congressional indignation. Almost immediately the matter was made the subject of strong denunciation in the Senate, and a searching investigation by a special committee was ordered, and our own Senator THOMAS, in the course of debate, gave the American people plain and solemn warning of the danger that besets them. He said:

"Unless the people of this country, the plain, law-abiding, middle-class people, realize, and realize very soon, the fact that there is a conspiracy, usually secret but frequently open, working for the overthrow of the Government of the United States and to erect upon its ruins a so-called government of murderers, anarchists, thieves, and criminals, with here and there some honest but deluded individual among them, the avalanche may be upon them in the near future."

The activities of this class of revolutionists should not be tolerated for a moment in this country. They are, in almost every instance, led by the discontented from other lands, aliens to our thought, institutions, and traditions. These alien agitators should, without delay, be sent back to the lands from whence they came. That their deportation will be wholesome is shown by the recent removal of a group of 54 to Ellis Island under a guard of soldiers while they rent the air with their shouts of "three cheers for the Bolsheviki!" and "to hell with America!"

To those of our own citizens who would by force destroy the free institutions of a country that has given them greater and broader opportunities for individual development than were ever given by any country of the world, there should be meted out punishment that would prove a deterrent to them in the future and prove a wholesome lesson to all who would by such means seek the destruction of our country.

There can be no excuse, in a country with institutions such as ours, where the ballot of every citizen is equal to that of every other, for seeking to change the form of our institutions by any method other than that of the peaceful use of the machinery provided by our laws.

As Mr. Justice Brewer said, in the earlier Debs case:

"In this Government of and by the people the means of redress of all wrongs are through the courts and at the ballot box, and no wrong, real or fancied, carries with it legal warrant to invite as a means of redress the cooperation of a mob with its accompanying acts of violence."

This is not an affair for Congress alone, nor for the Commissioner of Immigration, nor for the governor of any State, the mayor of any city, or the policeman on his beat. They need our aid. It is your affair; it is my affair; and the affair of every citizen of the United States. If we love our country, its institutions and traditions; if we believe, as I do, that under our form of government we have grown a people and builded a Nation that stands as the mightiest force for good the world has ever known, there should be no sacrifice too great for us to make in sustaining that Government, those institutions, and traditions.

I believe in all that makes for the betterment of mankind. I believe in every man's right to advance. I would not rob the people of that blessed discontent which ever leads them to seek for that which may better the lot of all the people, but I would have them give expression to this discontent and this seeking for better things in an orderly, peaceful manner that will permit of the retention of that which is good in the old while seeking for that which may be better in the new.

We, the lawyers of Colorado, the lawyers of America, should stand in the very forefront of all the people in endeavoring to lead them in just and righteous paths.

Lawyers made the Federal Constitution and the State constitutions. Lawyers have interpreted, construed, and given those charters of the people's liberties their vitality; but the lawyer of to-day is not as carefully trained in the fundamental principles of constitutional law as were those of an earlier day. He has become a specialist, more of a business man, and less of a lawyer, and by that same token the bar of the country has lost much of its leadership of the people which marked its earlier history.

Instead of acting as the adviser and leader of the people; instead of taking an active interest in every question which affects the welfare of the people, we concern ourselves more with the special interests of some business aggregation and the building of our individual fortunes.

The war which has closed was less dangerous to this country and its institutions than the revolutionary propaganda which is being carried on among our people. The war menace could be and was met and overcome by our boys in khaki who went into the fight with the same stout hearts, the same individual initiative and courage that have ever characterized the soldiers of this great Republic. The other danger is more insidious. With the great mass of our well-meaning people it should be met by reason and not by force, so long as they do not resort to violent and revolutionary methods.

The members of our profession should be better equipped to meet this situation than the men of any other calling. We should better understand what it would mean to lose the liberties guaranteed by that greatest of all political documents, the Constitution of the United States, of which William Pitt, after reading it, exclaimed:

"It will be the wonder and admiration of all future generations and the model of all future constitutions."

At the celebration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the Constitution in Philadelphia, it was beautifully and appropriately recited that:

"The adoption of the Constitution of the United States is the most important event in the history of the American people, and the instrument itself the sublimest achievement of mankind. It has taught the world that liberty can exist without license and authority without tyranny. How completely the principles upon which it is based have met every national need and every national peril!"

Under its beneficent provisions we have gone forward for more than 100 years, holding out the promise of freedom, liberty, and opportunity for all. We have gone on absorbing people from many lands. We have grown from a few millions, scattered along the Atlantic coast, to a mighty nation of more than 100,000,000, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Great Lakes to the Gulf and the far-flung islands of the sea.

We have crossed mountains and great plains; have felled forests and caused the desert to blossom as the rose; and wherever we have gone we have carried our faith in God, our institutions, and ourselves. We have builded homes, churches, and schools and have laid deep the foundations of human liberty which should stand unshaken throughout the centuries that are to come.

It is for the maintenance of these institutions, the preservation of these ideals that we, the lawyers of America, should be willing to put forth our mightiest endeavor.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] a few moments ago stated that the oil companies and the coal operators were responsible for the fearful condition and situation which exists in this country at this time. I hold no brief for any oil company or for any coal operator, but I do hold a brief for and have a personal interest in the welfare of the American people. I want to say that a man must be very much misinformed or uninformed not to see the present concerted effort in this country, in France, in Italy, and in England, influenced by German and Russian Bolshevism of the Lenin and Trotski type, through the threatened strike of the coal miners on November 1 and the existing strikes of the steel employees and the longshoremen and expressmen in New York, to overthrow, if possible, all government and to establish a state of anarchy. Because of such strikes tons of food have rotted in New York. Thousands of families have suffered privations, and this, too, when each and all of these employees have been receiving larger wages than ever known before in the history of this country, but who to-day are asking for things which under the industrial life of any country are impossible. These miners, the majority of them foreigners who can not speak English, are now asking, among other things, that the workday be decreased to six hours, and, as I said the other day, that means diminishing the production of coal in the country a flat 25 per cent. They ask that the work week be reduced from six days to five days, and that means that the production of the country be decreased another 16⅔ per cent, making in all a decreased production of coal, with winter approaching, with the possibility of thousands of poor women and innocent children freezing to death, of 41⅔ per cent. Yet these miners, under the whip and lash of autocratic, anarchistic, cold-blooded, radical leaders, agree to and arrange this wholesale murder of innocent, helpless women and little children with a cold, calculating precision. This is not a fight between labor and capital. It is an attempt to destroy our Government.

Why, if we do not wake up, and if we do not pass a proper law that will protect the interests of the whole people of this country, God knows what is going to happen to this Congress and the people we represent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield me one minute more?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma. I asked permission this morning to insert in the RECORD several thousand letters I have received, some from every congressional district in the United States, asking and demanding that Congress do something to protect the American people from this existing and threatened anarchy, and if you men could see those letters coming from your districts you would not object to their going into the RECORD, because your constituency is going to ask you about it when you get home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank you for the time consumed.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, 47 years ago a man, wife, and six sons, whose ages ranged from 2 to 13 years, drove three covered wagons from Illinois, crossing the Missouri River at Plattsmouth, Nebr., upon a ferryboat, and proceeded 100 miles westward into York County, locating a homestead, where four daughters were afterwards born. Habits of industry were induced with those 10 children by example of parents, and urgent need to break the prairie for planting; each year came many increasing acres for cultivation, sometimes experimental, to prove the value of soil and climate, setting a standard for others to follow of sowing and reaping.

The geography at that period of our history showed across the map of Nebraska in ragged lines, as where land and water meet, upon which was printed "the great American desert," and so it was then, and so it would be now except that our Government offered intrepid men, who would brave privation, toil, and hardship of producing crops where none had ever grown, 160 acres of land. Beyond doubt no new section has rewarded pioneer equal to Nebraska, with deep, rich, black soil, over which God drives his sprinkling cart, then comes sunshine and generous harvest.

In memory of those hard and happy years, deprived of ease and comfort, destitute of luxury, defying rigorous weather, those pioneers and native born, by life's work, earned the land twice over.

Now comes the farther West, from a section still harder to conquer, with rocks and desert, devoid of rainfall or rich prairies, but men from each State, proud to be part of this great Nation, note the State's numbered star in Old Glory, asking laws which encourage the pioneer.

The East seeks to protect those lands from imaginary foes, when its only foe is law, which denies title to the toiler who would improve it, who would give his life's work to reclaim it.

The people of those States love Uncle Sam, asking in return the trust of eastern men and the law which says to them, "Make this soil produce." If there was danger, the western man would first see and sound alarm.

What man of you, if owning a hundred wild mustangs, would not give some wrangler one of them for breaking all of them to saddle?

This legislation is guaranteed by men whose loyalty to our Government is beyond measure, and is introduced here with rugged honesty and sincerity of purpose for our Nation's good.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, is the chairman of the committee pressed for time? Can we help him by giving him some time?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am going to yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for nine minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the committee and I want to congratulate the country on the legislation which the committee has presented to the House. I do not mean to say that I think the bill is perfect. I have about made up my mind I am very hard to please in the matter of an oil and coal leasing bill. This bill or a bill similar to this in the main passed the House about six years ago and regularly during each of the last three Congresses we have passed an oil and coal leasing bill along the general lines of this bill. I think it has been a better bill every time it has been reported, and I think this bill, with its faults—and it has some faults, in my opinion—is the best bill that has been reported. It is similar in the main to the bill of the last Congress, and where changes have been made I think in the main the changes are improvements. Progress was made in improvement of the bill this time, as it has been each time the bill has been reported. I want to emphasize one fact. This bill is at last just what it purports to be, a leasing bill. I am very glad of that, because I am one of those who have insisted from the beginning that this leasing legislation should provide for leasing exclusively and should contain no provision for the passing of title. I was very greatly surprised at the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] in regard to the bill. I hope he has read it, but I am not sure, from what he said, that he ever has. I hope he has given it some consideration, but I doubt it. Whatever criticism may be legitimately made against this legislation, it can not be legitimately criticized on the ground that it is legislation aiding or encouraging monopolies. On the contrary, if that were true, then all the reformers calling themselves conservationists, all of the good people who have wanted to cure the evils which they insist arise out of private ownership of these lands, have been wrong from the beginning, and it is rather late in the day for gentlemen to urge that legislation, demanded not by the people in the West where these lands are but by well-meaning gentlemen mostly in the East calling themselves conservationists and believing themselves reformers, is legislation that aids and abets and encourages monopoly.

Under this law every acre of the public domain containing coal and oil now in public ownership, or the title to which has not passed into private ownership, is held perpetually in the Government, and with the control over the land and its products that the retention of title in the Government insures. The leases are carefully guarded and the areas that may be leased limited—rather too limited, some folks think. The control over the mining operations is constant and the public interest safeguarded as far as it is humanly possible to do so in legislation of this sort. Some gentlemen complain because the House committee did not retain in the bill two sections placed hurriedly on the bill at the eleventh hour by the Senate without debate or consideration—two sections claimed to be aimed at monopoly and monopolistic control. I am frank to say that I do not know how much virtue there may be in those two propositions, as they were written in the Senate bill separate and apart from this legislation, but I do know that when the Congress goes into the question of attempting to further limit and control the activities of those carrying on large operations, it should be done after consideration by the proper committee of the House and in connection with legislation dealing with and related to such matters and not as an eleventh-hour adjunct of a bill relating to the leasing of the public domain.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Bills similar to this have passed the House three times, when there was a Democratic majority, without any legislation of that sort; so it seems to me at least gentlemen on that side, who might at any time within the past six years have advanced that sort of a legislative proposal, are estopped now from complaining because the fourth time the House is asked to consider and pass legislation of this character the committee has not seen fit to take up questions that have never been considered heretofore in connection with the legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman inform the committee how the House can legitimately dispose of a provision placed on a bill by the Senate by just simply shutting their eyes and saying, "We will not act on it"? Is that the way to do?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not know that the House has done anything of the kind. I do not know just what considerations influenced the committee, but I know what had I been a member of the committee. I would have felt that whatever may be the merits of these propositions—and, in my opinion, in their present form they have little merit—whatever may be their merits this is no time or place to pass on them, because when we pass on questions of that kind we should pass on them as they relate to industry generally and not to one limited class of operations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit me to suggest to him, we have testimony covering 87 pages here of hearings which the committee gave to this very amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no doubt the committee gave it careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, comment, insinuations, and imputations have been made by various Members about the elimination of sections 40 and 41 of the Senate bill. As chairman of the committee I feel it my duty to answer these insinuations. Let me tell the House briefly why those amendments were eliminated.

In the first place, the committee hearings disclosed that these amendments were put on in the Senate with practically no consideration, although far-reaching in their character, on the last day, when the matter was under consideration, with a debate, including comments and copies of the amendment that did not occupy a column and a half of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We set aside our rule not to have hearings on the bill and invited before the committee the author of these amendments, so that he might explain them. The first amendment declares arbitrarily that stock which is held to-day by virtue of the decree of the Supreme Court can no longer be held. The holding of that stock to-day is a valid and vested right by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The author of this amendment was asked upon what principle of law he predicated the right to compel a man to divest himself of his vested property. His sole reply was that he was not a lawyer.

As to section 41, let me skeletonize it to you by striking out the parenthetical phrases between the first and last. Read it in its bare skeleton form, and what does it say? It says:

> It shall be unlawful for any corporation * * * to sell * * * at a different price than * * * is sold * * * by any other corporation * * * when the stockholders of such corporation * * * own or control 25 per cent * * * of the stock of such other corporation.

So under that if the stockholders of corporation A own 25 per cent of the stock of corporation B the oil sold by corporation A has to be at the price sold by corporation B. Let us say that corporation B is the Standard Oil Co.; one shareholder in the Standard Oil Co. owing 25 per cent of its stock or a group of Standard Oil stockholders owning 25 per cent of the stock could buy one share of corporation A, a competitor of the Standard Oil Co.; then the stockholders of corporation A would own 25 per cent of the stock of the Standard Oil Co., and the competitor of the Standard Oil Co. would have to sell at the same price as the Standard Oil Co. throughout this country. There never was a provision designed to give the Standard Oil Co. a greater instrument in fixing prices than section 41. It was not so designed by the author. His purposes were commendable and laudable, but he has placed an instrument, should this section 41 be enacted, in the hands of the Standard Oil Co. or any other great company to raise the price over the entire Nation up to the price the Standard Oil desires to fix.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I will not yield now. My time is too short.

That is one of the reasons why the committee eliminated these. These amendments sought to amend the Sherman antitrust law and sections 2 and 7 of the Clayton Act, which are to-day under consideration before the Judiciary Committee. They have these sections under consideration to amend. I saw the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on the Public Lands has no original jurisdiction over these matters. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee told me that he would give consideration and heed to these amendments, that he would investigate them, and if there is any merit in them they will receive the proper consideration. But we felt that these were improperly before our committee. And there is the further reason that, as the author of the measure stated, under section 40 he was seeking to amend the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States in the matter of the Standard Oil dissolution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas, and lands containing such deposits owned by the United States, including those in national forests, but excluding lands acquired under the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 961), known as the Appalachian forest act, and those in national parks and in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes, except as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, and in the case of coal, oil, oil shale, or gas to municipalities: Provided, That all right, title, and interest to all helium in the lands or deposits subject to disposition under this act are hereby expressly reserved and shall remain in the Government of the United States: Provided further, That citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to citizens or corporations of this country shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry before the Clerk reads the amendment. The committee has stricken out of the Senate bill lines 4 to 19, inclusive, on page 2, and now that it comes before the House does it require an amendment to put it back in the bill or must not the House vote upon it affirmatively?

The CHAIRMAN. The only question under consideration is the substitute offered for the Senate bill. If the gentleman offers an amendment, he will offer it to the House substitute. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 39, line 2, after the words "United States," strike out the following House amendment:

"Provided further, That citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to citizens or corporations of this country shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this act."

And insert in lieu thereof the following Senate provision:

"Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products; or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is not germane to the substitute offered by the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from California is not germane to the substitute.

Mr. RAKER. I want to be heard. That would present the anomalous situation which I felt, my friends, would be the result—that the bill from the Senate, passed by the Senate, referred to the House, to the proper committee, and by—I know the word to use, but I do not want to be harsh—they could say to return the bill to the House, and the Rules Committee would bring in a rule in that that provision that the Senate put in the bill and passed would not be germane to the original bill. We anticipated that that point would be raised, Mr. Chairman, when we got to sections 40 and 41, and I want to take this opportunity now just to call the chairman's attention and the attention of the Members to the anomalous position that we would be in, namely, that you could not act upon a bill passed by the Senate and sent to the House for its consideration.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MAYS. Did the gentleman arrange that the point of order should be made?

Mr. RAKER. I did not.

Mr. MAYS. Why does not the gentleman wait, then, until the Chair rules?

Mr. RAKER. I assumed that I had the right to argue on the point of order as anyone might if he desired, and the Chairman consented; and while I may not be as smooth in presenting it, and while I may be as deep, and may not understand all the parliamentary law covering the subject as well as certain other gentleman, I do at least have my opinion on the matter, and I wanted to call it to the attention of the House and of the country if it becomes necessary, if perchance the Chair is compelled to rule—I do not think he ought to be—but if he is compelled to rule that you can so manipulate and so shape legislation that you can not be heard on it by a vote of the Members of the House——

Mr. MAYS. Does the gentleman admit that the point of order is well taken?

Mr. RAKER. Surely, I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I am not through yet. It is up to the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will be heard.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that this is simply a statement as to the condition, and I anticipate and believe it is a fact that the Rules Committee did not intend to bring in a rule of this kind. I am going to assume that, and take it for granted, until I hear to the contrary that such an effort was made.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the rule is peculiar. The rule says we shall consider the House substitute. Then it uses other language, to the effect that the debate shall be confined to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman reply to a question of the Chair?

Mr. RAKER. I will if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contend that the Members of the House have lost any rights under the rule reported by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Then nobody contends that they have.

Mr. RAKER. A point of order is made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is made against the germaneness of the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. The germaneness to what?

The CHAIRMAN. To the bill before the House.

Mr. RAKER. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is the bill before the House. That is the point. That is the Senate bill 2775, the bill before the House; and if it was put in the proper form in which every other bill comes before the House, that provision of the bill would have been stricken out by the committee, and the House would have been compelled to vote on that amendment—to vote whether it would retain it in the bill or strike it out.

But clearly the Committee on Public Lands can not come before the Committee on Rules and exclude the consideration of the very Senate bill that is now under consideration before the House. Why, if that should be the rule, they should at least have given the House an opportunity to discuss and act upon it this morning, to be fair and frank and open. This is not a question of germaneness. This is the germ itself. [Laughter.] This is the thing itself, the Senate bill, with every word and syllable in it, and the question is, What will you strike out of that Senate bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not now; in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege, on behalf of the point of order I have made, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS] indicated that there might be a frame-up between the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Texas. I want to deny any such assertion. If I could, I would not frame up. I will say that to the distinguished gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] that he understands the gentleman to contend that it is not within the province of the Committee on the Public Lands or any committee of the House to strike out an entire Senate bill and substitute another bill. The Chair dissents from that view. The Chair thinks it is perfectly in order and within the power of the committee to strike out anything and provide anything in its place, and that what is substituted becomes the subject matter for the consideration of the House.

On the point of order the Chair holds that the amendment of the gentleman from California opens up a new subject. The provision of the bill which he undertakes to amend provides—

That citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to the citizens or corporations of this country shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this act.

The gentleman from California seeks to amend that provision by providing—

That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale, for consumption in the United States, of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the facts thereof.

It clearly appears to the Chair that the provision of the amendment just read, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], opens up a subject that is not provided for in the section of the bill which he seeks to amend, and hence the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Are we to understand, then, that it is your ruling——

The CHAIRMAN. You do not have to get an explanation of the ruling of the Chair. It has already been made.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am making a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will put it in the form of a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know from you, sir, whether you can not offer to substitute the language of the Senate, the original Senate bill, in the place of the substitute bill that comes from this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair decided that question when the gentleman offered it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish to call attention to the provisions of this paragraph with reference to helium. I doubt very much whether in its present form it will accomplish what is evidently desired by the committee. Helium in its pure state is found only in the form of a gas. As the members of the committee well know, it is a noninflammable gas. It is expected that the Government may at some time make use of it to inflate dirigible balloons, and that it will be useful in warfare for the reason that it will not take fire from explosive bullets. But in its natural state it is always found combined with other elements, and in substances of which it is never, so far as I know, the principal component part. In fact it is only a very small part of the substance in which it is combined.

Mr. SINNOTT. The statement which the gentleman has just made is correct, and that fact is acknowledged and recognized in section 38 of the bill. The matter of the extraction of it is taken care of.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. SNELL. I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Under the provisions of this bill—

Citizens of another country the laws, customs, or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to citizens or corporations of this country, shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control, own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this act.

As I understand it, the British Government does not allow any alien to own any oil lands under the control of that Government. According to this act, what would be the result if a British subject owned stock in any one of our oil companies? What would be the situation in which he would find himself?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the British Government discriminates against us, we meet that discrimination by denying to its citizens the rights that are withheld from us.

Mr. SNELL. If I were a British subject and held some stock in one of these oil companies, would I be forced to sell it?

Mr. SINNOTT. The stock could be declared forfeited, under the forfeiture clause in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. There is no protection then for any foreigner who happens to own stock in one of our oil companies, is there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Not if his Government denies us the same rights.

Mr. SNELL. I understand the British Government forbids aliens to own or control any of their oil lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. That representation has been made to the committee, and to individual members of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know whether it is true or not?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no reason to doubt the representation.

Mr. SNELL. Then a British subject would be obliged to forfeit or sell his stock, and get out of the company as quickly as possible.

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be the interpretation I would place upon the law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Under the rule which provides for the consideration of this bill, if a motion is made to strike out section 1 of the House substitute, as it is called, and if that motion prevails, does that of its own force put into the bill section 1 of the Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not. It simply strikes out what the motion provides shall be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. If you strike out section 1 of the substitute, what becomes of the section for which it was a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides—

That the reading of the Senate bill shall be dispensed with and for the purpose of amendment the House committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill.

So that there is nothing before the Committee of the Whole except the House substitute, which is considered as an original bill.

Mr. WALSH. And in order to preserve a section in the Senate bill some other language must be included in the motion, if a motion is made to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Without a doubt.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted that to be made clear at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, in line 2, page 39, to strike out all after the words "United States" down to and including line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 39, line 2, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, we are in an anomalous position, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that no such thing as this has ever occurred in nine years. It may have occurred before, but I do not believe it ever did, that when a bill is considered by the House the provisions of that bill are considered not germane to the matter before the House.

This amendment changes the present law. There is no reason for it; there is no justification for it, and I ask any member of the committee if there was one word of testimony or one word in the way of a hearing, except statements presented——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not for a moment. As I stated a while ago, I want to state again, on this motion to strike out you are saying under the provisions of this amendment that citizens of any foreign country that permits foreigners to own mineral lands may, by owning stock in corporations, obtain control of the vast mineral resources of this country. Then you discriminate. There is no need of saying now that the question of stock ownership is not involved, because the bill says that a citizen of a country that does not permit mineral ownership by an American citizen can not own stock in a corporation of the United States that applies for a lease. That is what you say. Guatemala does not permit an American citizen to own any of its sodium or phosphates.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not for a moment. Therefore a citizen of Guatemala can not own any interest in these mines in this country. Venezuela does permit any alien, including citizens of the United States, to own an interest in the minerals of that country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, we have been very indulgent to the gentleman from California, and I object.

Mr. RAKER. You have not been indulgent to me, and, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum. You will have to have a quorum here all the time. I want to say that we want this matter considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be more here than I thought at first, and I withdraw the point of order. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes, because there is one matter that I did not have time to mention.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has had 40 minutes, and I object.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has received generous treatment as to time. The House has always been generous to the gentleman from California. They have always rewarded his very great industry. The gentleman should not show temper when he does not always have his own way. He is so much more fortunate than most of us in always having his own way. He is a strong Member of the House. His services are always faithful and earnest.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is it not a fact that we are providing for the consideration of the bill exactly in the same form in which it was considered last year by unanimous consent?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; and I was going to come to that. Many, many times in every Congress since I have been here this procedure has been had; usually by unanimous consent, it is true, but nevertheless the same procedure. And for the gentleman from California to be railing against this procedure seems to me is not well taken.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Would not the gentleman say to the House that there has never an instance occurred, by unanimous consent or otherwise, where a Senate bill was eliminated and you could not go back and offer a part of the Senate bill as an amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. I say that that very thing has happened, not once but many times, in the 14 years I have been here. There is nothing new or novel about this procedure to have a House bill considered instead of a Senate bill.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I will say that when the bill was passed for the sale of the segregated mineral lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, exactly that procedure was adopted and no amendment was permitted of any Senate provision when the bill was brought in.

Mr. FERRIS. My colleague is right. It has been done so many times that it is almost the rule, instead of the exception, usually by unanimous consent, and the records of the Public Lands Committee will show that fact. The procedure is what happens all the time. The Senate passes a bill, sends it over here, the House amends it, and when it comes up for consideration as an original bill it gives the House the opportunity to amend it, gives the House the opportunity to change it, gives the House the opportunity to do the very thing they want to do, and we are following that course. This is the best way to do it. This is the way to let the House offer any and all germane amendments, otherwise it would be but a simple amendment, and the House could not consider it section by section, which is the correct way.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is to prevent the offering of any amendment——

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all; the gentleman from California and the gentleman from New York can now or any time offer any amendment or as many amendments as they like. This procedure enables them to do what they like. Of course, they must be germane amendments, and I submit that is the way it should be. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer to vote on the gentleman's proposal and dispose of it in that way.

Mr. GRIFFIN. You are preventing us from going back to the Senate language and offering that as an amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What is the object in restricting persons who may be members of corporations in the latter part of section 1, in the last proviso?

Mr. SINNOTT. That merely relates to the alien stock ownership; there is no restriction in section 1 on corporations securing a lease.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not let in alien stockholders?

Mr. SINNOTT. Some foreign countries discriminate against citizens of the United States in stock ownership.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The general purpose of the bill is for exploitation?

Mr. SINNOTT. We hope so.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Then why is it not the money of the aliens as good as the money of the citizens?

Mr. SINNOTT. We think our own citizens are entitled first to the development of the oil fields.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not strike out the provision that permits any alien to become interested?

Mr. SINNOTT. Because those who discriminate against us, if we retaliate, perhaps they may do away with the discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 12, strike out the words "and lands containing such deposits."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to confine myself to this amendment. I am a little disappointed, although I take it in good nature. I have been active on the committee. I have sought amendments and I have secured many. I have tried to do my duty as a Representative. I was given only 40 minutes on a bill where I should have had enough time to present it fully to the committee. I will get the parliamentarian to look and see if I am not right, but I think there has never been a rule in nine years whereby a Senate provision in a bill could not be considered in the House in considering a Senate bill that it would be ruled out of order because it was not germane. I remember the unanimous-consent agreement last year——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not just now. I am not going to take up any more time when I get through. I am going to offer my amendments and get along as rapidly as we can. There was no condition of that kind existing then, but the only purpose was to get it to the House. My 40 minutes were on general debate. I have taken only 10 minutes of the time under the five-minute rule, and as a member of the committee I was disappointed, and I say this with all sincerity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not do it except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

COAL.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to, and upon the petition of any qualified applicant shall, divide any of the coal lands or the deposits of coal, classified and unclassified, owned by the United States, outside of the Territory of Alaska, into leasing tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such tracts, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing tract; and thereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall, in his discretion, upon the request of any qualified applicant or on his own motion, from time to time offer such lands or deposits of coal for leasing, and shall award leases thereon by competitive bidding, or by such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any qualified applicant: Provided, That the Secretary is hereby authorized, in awarding leases for coal lands heretofore improved and occupied or claimed in good faith, to consider and recognize equitable rights of such occupants or claimants: Provided, That where prospecting or exploratory work is necessary to determine the existence or workability of coal deposits in any unclaimed, undeveloped area, the Secretary of the Interior may issue, to applicants qualified under this act, prospecting permits for a term of two years for not exceeding 2,560 acres; and if within said period of two years thereafter the permittee shows to the Secretary that the land contains coal in commercial quantities, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease under this act for all or part of the land in his permit: Provided further, That no lease of coal under this act shall be approved or issued until after notice of the proposed lease or offering for lease has been given for 30 days in a newspaper of general circulation in the county in which the lands or deposits are situated: Provided further, That no company or corporation operating a common-carrier railroad shall be given or hold a permit or lease under the provisions of this act for any coal deposits except for its own use for railroad purposes, and such limitations of use shall be expressed in all permits and leases issued to such companies or corporations, and no such company or corporation shall receive or hold more than one permit or lease for each 200 miles of its railroad line within the State in which said property is situated, exclusive of spurs or switches and exclusive of branch lines built to connect the leased coal with the railroad, and also exclusive of parts of the railroad operated mainly by power produced otherwise than by steam: Provided, That nothing herein shall preclude such a railroad of less than 200 miles in length from securing and holding one permit or lease hereunder.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN offers the following amendment: Page 39, line 9, strike out the whole of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof section 2 of the Senate bill on page 2, lines 21 down to line 20, page 3.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane to the substitute now under consideration. It is not germane to the subject as brought in here under the rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order that the amendment is not in writing.

Mr. BLANTON. I have made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment inserts, instead of the language of the committee for section 2, the language contained in the Senate bill, as it came over here for our action. In other words, we want to substitute section 2 of the Senate bill as it was passed in the Senate.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I wish the gentleman would explain the difference between the two.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is immaterial what the difference is between the two sections. The gentleman is just as familiar with it as I am, and a great deal more so. The material point is this, that the language of the House committee is sought to be stricken out by the amendment and the language of the Senate bill inserted. It is submitted to the judgment of the Chair that the amendment is not germane. Not germane? What becomes of the rule that anything that pertains to the subject matter of the section may be proposed as an amendment? I am aware that the Chairman has already passed upon the subject, or one phase of it in the amendment to section 1, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. The Chairman has already committed himself on that proposition, and I presume, if he is to be consistent, he will make a similar ruling here; although a distinction might well be made. The language of section 2 of the Senate bill is nearer to the subject matter than the language of section 1, which the gentleman from California proposed to substitute for section 1 of the House bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. So that in that regard I think, perhaps, the Chairman has a chance to escape from his own ruling; but whether the language is similar or not, whether the matters contained in any section of the Senate bill may be more numerous or less numerous than those provided for in the committee substitute, whether or not there is this difference, or any difference, the substitution of a Senate section for the corresponding committee section is in order.

Several gentlemen rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's argument is not to the germaneness of his amendment.

A MEMBER. The gentleman is not addressing the Chair.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am trying to do so, Mr. Chairman, but there are gentlemen standing on the other side who seem to be anxious to interrupt me. However, let me appeal to the Chairman on this matter as a parliamentary proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the matter discussed from a parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I maintain that there is a difference between my amendment and that which was proposed by the gentleman from California. In the case of section 1 of the Senate bill, which he proposed to introduce in place of——

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota can not take the gentleman from New York off his feet with a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In place of the committe bill, both language and the matter varied; but in this section, if the Chairman will observe, not only is the matter identical but almost the language as well. There is very little variation between the two, but independent of that I still maintain this proposition, that an amendment is germane so long as it adheres to the general subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Chair pardon me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to make one statement. The gentleman from Oklahoma stated that the method by which this bill has been substituted for the Senate bill gives us an opportunity to amend. My amendment is an illustration, if you please, as to whether or not we can amend this bill by substituting the language of the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made. As the Chair understood the gentleman from New York, he was trying to convince the Chair that the point of order should not be sustained. The Chair begs to say to the committee that he has read both these sections—the section provided in the Senate bill and stricken out by the House committee and the section reported by the Committee on Public Lands in the House bill—and the matter contained in the section of the Senate bill is all contained in the section of the House bill; but the House bill contains more than the Senate bill. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment to strike out all of the House section and substitute for it the Senate section, which the Chair believes is in order and overrules the point of order. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, a point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York has never been reported to the House, and we do not know what we are voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I took it for granted the Chair, in not giving me a chance to be heard for a moment, was going to rule in favor of the point of order, and I would like to be heard for just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not fair for the gentleman or any other gentleman on the floor to take for granted what the Chair is going to do. The Chair has already ruled and the question now is on the amendment which the Clerk will report.

Page 39, line 9, strike out the whole of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following: Section 2 of the Senate bill, on page 2, line 25, down to line 23 on page 3.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the amendment is not in order, because it is not germane to the legislation which is brought before the House under the rule and which is now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just ruled it is in order and, of course, the gentleman's point of order would not be proper just now. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands or coal deposits under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, upon a finding by him that it will be for the advantage of the lessee and the United States, secure modifications of his or its original lease by including additional coal lands or coal deposits contiguous to those embraced in such lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such modified lease exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I simply desire to call attention that this section of the House bill is identical with the section of the Senate bill so as to show that practically all the bill except the particular amendments to which I have called the attention of the committee is legislation which passed the House before——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to do it but I make the point of order that the distinguished gentleman from California is not speaking to his amendment, which is to strike out the word "acres."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD the Senate bill as it passed the Senate and the House bill as reported, paralleling each other section by section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the coal in the lands covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be fixed in advance of offering the same, and which shall not be less than 5 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, due and payable at the end of each third month succeeding that of the extraction of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter, on the lands or coal deposits covered by such lease, at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the same, which shall not be less than 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, not less than 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and not less than $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines, except when such operation shall be interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee, and upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period succeeding the date of the lease such readjustment of terms and conditions may be made as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, in lieu of the provision herein contained requiring contitnuous operation of the mine or mines, provide in the lease for the payment of an annual advance royalty upon a minimum number of tons of coal, which in no case shall aggregate less than the amount of rentals herein provided for: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may permit suspension of operation under such lease for not to exceed six months at any one time when market conditions are such that the lease can not be operated except at a loss.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 43, line 16, to strike out the word "may," where it first occurs, and substitute therefor the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 43, line 16, strike out the word "may," at the beginning of the line, and substitute therefor the word "shall."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the word "time," in the second line on page 44, the words "in any 18 months' period."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Evans of Nebraska: Page 44, line 2, after the word "time," insert the words "in any 18 months' period."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I see no particular objection in that amendment, except I think the matter ought to be left to the discretion of the Secretary. Certain contingencies might arise, and I do not think that his discretion should be limited. That is the only objection I have.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local domestic needs for fuel, the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue limited licenses or permits to municipal corporations to prospect for, mine, and take for their use coal from the public lands without payment of royalty for the coal mined or the land occupied, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interests: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may issue such limited license or permit, for not to exceed 320 acres for a municipality of less than 100,000 population, and 1,280 acres for a municipality of not less than 100,000 and not more than 150,000 population; and 2,560 acres for a municipality of 150,000 population or more, the land to be selected within the State wherein the municipal applicant may be located, upon conditions that such municipal corporations will mine the coal therein under proper conditions and dispose of the same without profit to residents of such municipality for household use: And provided further, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the holding of such tract or operation of such mine under said limited license.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to clarify the section. Line 16, after the word "and," page 44, insert "not to exceed," and also in line 19, after the last "and," insert "not to exceed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 44, line 16, after the word "and," insert the words "not to exceed," and page 44, line 19, after the second "and," insert the words "not to exceed."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Page 44, lines 21, 22, and 23, strike out the following words: "The land to be selected within the State wherein the municipal applicant may be located."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 21, after the word "more," strike out the following language: "The land to be selected within the State wherein the municipal applicant may be located."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of this amendment is that I think it will clarify the section and avoid any clouding of the real condition. The way it is now, a city in Nebraska would have to get its coal in Nebraska. If you strike out this language, and I think it ought to go out, there would be no limitation, and there ought not to be. Any city that desired to obtain coal under the provisions of this act could obtain it and have a municipal coal supply, instead of limiting it to any particular State. In other words, a city in Utah would get coal in Utah. A city right over the line, in Idaho, could not get any coal in Utah. In Colorado, a city in the West outside of Colorado would get none of the benefits of the act. And there is no reason why the large cities in the particular States where they are located should be given an exclusive right to have the benefits of this, whereas if there are other cities in the United States that provide a municipal coal supply for their people in order to keep them warm and give the necessary heat and light, and the necessary comforts to make them happy, they ought to have the opportunity, and they should not be cut off by State lines. It is not a State-line proposition. It has no relation to the States. The property belongs to the Government and not to any particular locality and not to any particular district. But I repeat again, that any city that is up to date and progressive and desires to furnish its poor people with heat and light and things to live on would not be able to get them according to the provision of this section. The provision ought to be taken out so as to leave it as clear as it can be, without confusion or otherwise.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment. It seems to me it would be unfair to restrict it to States where the municipalities exist, because there are some States where no coal can be found at all, and in most of the States there are no public lands at all. Nebraska is a State without a single coal mine. I think that in order to be fair the amendment ought to be adopted so as to allow municipalities in all of the States equal rights. So I shall vote in favor of the amendment, if I understand it correctly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the Public Lands Committee has thrashed this matter out exhaustively. If there is any one provision in this bill that I have been most interested in, it is this section 8. I have been fighting for a law that would allow cities and towns to locate and open up and operate a municipal coal mine for 10 years in this House. But we have always limited it to the towns and cities within States in which the coal mines are situated. If any outside city wants to come into Colorado or Utah or North Dakota, or into any other public-land State that has coal in it, and buy patented coal lands and operate a coal mine, there is nothing to prevent it from doing so. But Secretary of the Interior Fisher and Secretary Lane were both opposed to and deemed it contrary to public policy to allow all of the cities of the United States to go and make a location of the public coal lands within the States that have coal. This is a local matter. To prevent local extortions and give the municipalities in the immediate vicinity of large coal areas an opportunity to obtain cheap coal for their own domestic consumption——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. What effect will the elimination of this provision have upon the rental the Government will get and the States will get?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, nobody else would develop the coal mines. It would make the whole provision absurd. That is all there is to it. It simply means it will kill that section and prevent any municipality from obtaining any benefit from being located near vast quantities of idle Government coal. The committee, as I say, has so thoroughly considered this subject, I hope the amendment will be voted down. I have always had to fight the big coal companies on this matter. I am trying to give poor people cheap coal, where they live near millions of tons of coal, and it ought to be furnished to them cheap. If coal companies will be halfway reasonable, the municipalities will not go into the coal business.

Mr. RANDALL of California. This bill does not attempt to dispose of any coal that belongs to the State of Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; but it allows people to open up and operate coal mines under the protection of Colorado's laws and use Colorado's good roads and courts and schools, and pay mighty little taxes on the land that they merely lease.

Mr. RANDALL of California. It belongs to the Government of the United States, and belongs to the State of Nebraska just as much as to Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It does not belong to either the State of Nebraska or to the municipalities throughout the United States.

Mr. RANDALL of California. It belongs to the municipalities of Nebraska as much as to the municipalities of Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, we have never adopted a policy——

Mr. RANDALL of California. You had better adopt one now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (continuing). Of allowing residents of one State to be Federal tenants of the public domain within some other State.

Mr. SINNOTT. And this would make a municipality amenable to the laws of another State.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This amendment is entirely illogical, impracticable, and ridiculous. It can not benefit anyone but the big coal operators and will prevent any municipality from getting coal at a fair price, and I ask that the amendment be rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. This amendment was never in that bill before until it came from the Senate, and the House simply took this out of the Senate amendment. Is not that right?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; it is not right.

Mr. RAKER. I am talking about this provision as to 100,000 and 200,000 population.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Senate has made various amendments of my bill. This section 8 of this bill that you are trying to amend is what is left of my original municipal coal bill, the same bill that Secretary Fisher and Secretary Lane both favorably recommended and the Public Lands Committee has three times given us a favorable report upon.

Mr. RAKER. I am talking about these municipalities being confined in the States. That is a new provision in this bill, is it not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; it is not. I have had it in the bill always. The Interior Department always required that, and our committee always did, and I can not understand why the gentleman sees so many mare's-nests in this bill that we have so carefully prepared. In fact, we have gone over and over and over this bill and this identical provision until it has become hoary and bald-headed, and all the rest of us want to pass this bill and have it become a law sometime.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say that it has not been in any other bill that has passed the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It would be ridiculous to permit every city and town in the United States—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and all other cities—to be locating and operating a coal mine out on the public domain in some of the Western States. None of those cities are asking for this amendment. If any Member wants that kind of a law, let him introduce such a bill and work as long and hard as I have toward trying to help relieve the cities and towns of my State from the extortions of the big coal companies. But do not try to kill this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 12, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7138) granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

MINING OF COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHOSPHATES.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease to any applicant qualified under this act any lands belonging to the United States containing deposits of phosphates, under such restrictions and upon such terms as are herein specified, through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as the Secretary of the Interior may by general regulation adopt.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I was called out for a moment. I ask unanimous consent to return and add a separate section after section 8, to be numbered as section 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to return to section 8 for the purpose of offering a separate section at the end of section 8. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand it is not an amendment to section 8, but it is for the purpose of adding an additional paragraph?

Mr. BAER. An additional section.

Mr. SINNOTT. A subsection?

Mr. BAER. Yes; a subsection.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us what it is?

Mr. BAER. It is an amendment giving the States the same rights under the provisions of this act as the municipality has.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment, and the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAER: On page 45, at the end of section 8, following line 4, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 8a. That, subject to the provisions, limitations, and conditions of this act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue leases for coal owned by the United States and the lands containing same to any State of the United States the constitutional laws of which authorize it to engage in the business of mining, extracting, treating, and disposing of such mineral deposits."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That each lease shall be for not to exceed 2,560 acres of land to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, if surveyed; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the survey of public lands, and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such survey; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose; and any excess deposits shall be repaid to the person, association, or corporation making such deposits or their legal representatives: Provided, That the land embraced in any one lease shall be in compact form.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 45, line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment up.

Mr. RAKER. That is all right. Strike out "prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for" and insert in lieu thereof "governing the survey."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: On page 45, line 18, after the word "regulations," strike out the words "prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for" and insert in lieu thereof the words "governing the survey."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, since the beginning or the adoption of the public-land laws the law has stood as I have offered the amendment, that it shall be governed by the laws, rules, and regulations governing the survey of public lands.

This amendment of the House committee, which I believe should be changed, authorizes the prescribing of rules and regulations by the Secretary of the Interior for this survey. There is no reason for it except to make additional expense and cost. The House passed it three times, the Senate passed it twice, the conferees agreed upon it, and it is only natural and proper that the survey should be made according to the rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands instead of in each particular instance allowing the Secretary of the Interior on each particular application, or by general rules, if you please, to make regulations governing the surveys of these particular phosphate claims, instead of following the rules and regulations for public-land surveys.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I do not yield just now. That being the case, you had unnecessary trouble and complications and you make the matter uncertain. There are rules and regulations already established that everybody knows, and you continue the survey of the remaining public lands according to the mode and method of surveying the public lands which now prevails. This matter was gone into fully before in the committee, and in the hearings the question was asked of Mr. Finney, who always appeared before the committee; but this time, for some reason, this provision has unfortunately crept into the substitute.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman sure that his amendment is correct? As I heard it read from the Clerk's desk it seems to me that the gentleman will have a duplication of language, certainly of the word "survey," unless he omits that word.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman is right on that, and I ask to modify my amendment by striking out the word "survey." Then it will read:

Under the laws, rules, and regulations governing public-land surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, this matter was thoroughly considered in the committee. This language was placed in the bill because some of the laws for the survey of the public lands are misfits and can not be made workable, and we want to give the Secretary of the Interior the right to establish rules and regulations.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield, in his time, for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the object of the committee in putting this language into the bill is to avoid the very thing that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] says it will cause. The language of the bill as it is will avoid the utterly unnecessary and useless expense, prolonged delay, and useless hardships which the gentleman's amendment would cause.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not just now. I did not interrupt the gentleman at all, notwithstanding he has talked for an hour and a half here to-day.

Mr. RAKER. That is all right. The gentleman can be courteous and yield if he wants to, but he does not have to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not mean to be discourteous, but I do not want to be interrupted before I get started. Under the present elaborate and obsolete system of conducting public-land surveys, if a person wants to go and take up a piece of unsurveyed land—I do not care if it is only 40 acres—under the volume of rules and regulations of the United States Land Office and the United States surveyors general he will have to wait probably from one to three years, and then have a whole township surveyed, which would bankrupt any ordinary man, in order to get the one little piece of ground. Under the provision which we have in this bill the Secretary of the Interior can authorize a United States deputy surveyor to go ahead and run out this particular land, just as he would a mining claim, and allow his permit or lease within a very short time and at very little expense.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Under what theory would he have to survey a whole township in order to get 40 acres run out?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman is familiar with all the surveying regulations of the Government in surveying in the mountains he will find out.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I know about them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If a homesteader on unsurveyed public domain wants to get his numbers so he can file or prove up on his 160-acre claim on the public domain, the chances are that the United States surveyor will start from some point 20 or 30 miles away to get a starting point.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. There is a stone on every corner.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, there are no stones or any other corners there. The public domain throughout the mountainous portions of the West, where most of this coal and oil and gas will be found, are largely not surveyed at all, and even where it was once surveyed the corners are largely gone. The idea of this provision is that if we are compelled to comply with the regular surveyor's manual and with all the department rules and red tape and delay with regard to surveying the public domain throughout that portion of the country wherever a claim is located it will entirely prevent most poor people from getting any leases at all. The object of this language is to avoid that situation and allow the Secretary to adopt some simple, expeditious, inexpensive, and practical course that will fit the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California. Those in favor will say "aye."

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Those opposed will say "no." The noes appear to have it, the noes have it, and the amendment is rejected. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet demanding recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman, and the question was being put, and has been put and decided. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word and is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for a long time to have all the provisions contained in this bill with regard to the survey of the unsurveyed public lands made the same and to have them of a character to fit the situation. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] would not improve the language now in the section. It would, rather, confuse a provision that is not really clear. As a matter of fact, in line 19 the words "for the survey of public lands" should be stricken out, and the language that should be used, not only in this case but in all cases with regard to these surveys, should be—

In accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

There are no rules and regulations now prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior with regard to the survey of the public lands that would fit these conditions, but the Secretary of the Interior must prescribe rules and regulations under which these surveys shall be made, and the committee have so provided; but I think they have inadvertently left in the bill the words "for the survey of public lands." If those words were stricken out in this provision and in all the other provisions of the bill having to do with surveys, it would then leave the Secretary with full authority to make such rules and regulations as in his opinion were necessary to make these surveys.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is what the committee wants to do.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the committee; but what the committee proposes to do could, in my opinion, be done more clearly and definitely and beyond question if the words "for the survey of public lands," in line 19, were stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the words referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming, in line 19, "for the survey of public lands," be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to go back to the section before he can do that.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to return to the section for that purpose.

Mr. RAKER. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. We have not passed that section; the Clerk has not read the next section. It is not necessary to move to go back to it. I was on my feet demanding recognition at the time and before the amendment was voted on.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is clearly mistaken, because the Clerk had already read the succeeding section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the pardon of the gentleman from Wyoming. The Chair does not agree with the statement just made that the Clerk read section 11. The question was on an amendment offered by the gentleman from California, and it was voted upon. It was rejected, and the Clerk was directed to begin the reading of section 11.

Mr. MONDELL. The Clerk was directed to begin the reading, but he had not begun the reading; and I was on my feet demanding recognition. I was on my feet demanding recognition before the vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. So the Clerk did not proceed with the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming may have been on his feet, but the gentleman from California had taken his seat before the vote on his amendment was taken. The gentleman from Wyoming will concede the right of the Chair not to have seen the gentleman from Wyoming until after the amendment was voted on?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not concede that; but certainly I was on my feet demanding recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming does not claim the right to the floor until he is recognized, does he?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that I ought to discuss that with the Chair, but I think a Member has a right to the floor when the amendment is before the House and debate is not exhausted, as it was in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no need of a controversy about it. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Wyoming until after the amendment was voted on.

Mr. MONDELL. And then the Chair did recognize him.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. So we are still on that section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that a bill of this importance demands a larger attendance than we have here.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will not make the point now.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that we are on section 10 at the present time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 19, page 45, the words "for the survey of public lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 19, after the word "interior," strike out the words "for the survey of public lands."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. It is bad enough the way it is in the bill. The committee said in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, in substance, shall be for the survey of public lands. It was not necessary for the survey of a particular claim to survey an entire section or township, but this allows an entirely new procedure, allows the Secretary of the Interior to go out on the public domain, authorize the survey of a claim whereby there might be, as to surrounding public lands, no regard as to connecting up with other surveys, but designating one particular tract for a survey; whereas the policy heretofore has been to keep the public survey in uniform condition. This entirely eliminates the uniformity which now prevails, so that everybody may know what the public-land surveys are and where the land is, so that you can describe it by metes and bounds.

Under this legislation you allow the Secretary of the Interior to make laws and regulations in regard to the survey, and do not even suggest that he shall comply with any regard to the public-lands survey, or any method or any sort of system with reference to the disposition of the remaining public domain. I do not believe that authority ought to be given, or that this new innovation ought to be practiced, as to the remaining part of the public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I do that to submit some general observations on the bill, and I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks after I have used five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I view this bill with apprehension. I might say that I view it with suspicion. The Government of the United States within a hundred years, with what it received in the way of grants from Mexico and the Louisiana and Alaskan Purchases, has owned more in the way of public lands than was ever possessed by any government or by any people in the previous history of all the world.

We have frittered away those lands until now almost nothing remains. We gave to the railroads enough of our public domain to equal the area of all the States north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi Rivers. The people of the United States got very little, if anything, in return. The lands went into the capitalization of the railroads. They and their proceeds are yet being carried as railroad assets where they have not been stolen by railroad promoters, and the people of the country are required to pay taxes in the way of rates to pay an income to the railroads on those lands.

The vast public domain carried deposits of gold and silver, and of iron, coal, and other minerals rich beyond the dreams of imagination. What have the people of the United States received of benefits for all those splendid resources of rich surface and priceless minerals?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Excuse me, please. Of course, we have received very little, if any, benefits. I admit that I do not like to think of our Government as a great landlord of either the surface or of the minerals in the lands, and I should have no great grief if this great wealth of the Nation had been evenly divided out among the people. If the people of the United States who were here then or who have come since, or who are now here, had had divided among them with any sort of equity or equality this great natural wealth, I should not feel so much distressed. But the fact is that nearly all of this, our national resources, has gone into the hands of a few—the few have been the chief beneficiaries. The fact is that nearly all of this wealth of fertile soil and minerals has been monopolized by a few men, who use it not for the honor and greatness of our country, but who use these resources collected into their hands by unjust, oppressive, and frequently dishonest methods as a means of further oppression. They use the resources which were once the common property of all as a further means of exploiting labor and grinding the faces of the poor, as a further means of heaping up greater stores of wealth and aggregating the riches of America into the hands of the few, while the great multitude sinks deeper into despair.

The great concern which fills my heart is, who shall get the benefits of this bill, who shall get the minerals that will be granted under this bill? If they are to go into the hands of the monopolists, who now control practically all the minerals not on public lands, then I would see in the passage of this bill the fall of a calamity on this country.

I shall vote against this bill. I view it with perhaps what some may call unreasonable suspicion, but in the light of the past experience of the people of this country I fear the resources granted by it will eventually go into the hands of the monopolists. I regard these men and their methods as a danger to American institutions, as a danger to the welfare of our Republic, to the future of this country, and to the liberties of the people, and I would not add one hair's weight to their strength or influence. They are not content merely to take for themselves our natural resources, but they usurp the right to dictate to men in public office, to the representatives of the people—they assert the right to rule our country and control its public affairs. They do not dare to try to govern by open and public means, but resort to conspiracy and hidden methods.

I am unwilling to make further grants of our resources to the men who are now abusing what we have granted heretofore. Captains of industry must show a new spirit before I will consent to add to their opportunities for evil. Even to-day I have had brought before me a new illustration of the lust for power of those who dominate the great coal-mining industry. The chief purpose of my speaking to-day is to lay the situation before Congress and the Nation.

Big business acts for business reasons, not upon considerations of altruism or patriotism. Big business is cold and selfish. It knows neither religion, country, nor sentiment. It bends its every thought to obey the precept, "Put money in thy purse." Its god is profits, its country wherever good returns may be had from investments, its humanitarianism is how to get the greatest amount of labor for the smallest outlay.

The evil mainsprings of big business are so universally detested that men interested in public questions are quick to charge big business with opposing them. The support of big business is a liability, not an asset, when public sentiment is involved, so that great financiers and captains of industry, when seeking to control public action, operate through parasite newspapers and secret channels.

FIGHTING THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The enemies of the league of nations have been bold in charging that certain great financial interests are working for the adoption of the league. So far as I can learn no proof of this charge has been offered. It has not been commonly known that certain powerful business interests are secretly fighting the league of nations. The charge that such is a fact should not be lightly made, and I should not make the charge except for the fact that I hold proofs to sustain it in my hands. I now charge with all deliberation that certain of the great employers of the United States are fighting the league of nations because of the labor clauses contained in its covenant. The fight is being made in secret. It wears the hypocritical cloak of patriotic opposition. No doubt much of the opposition to the league of nations is sincerely on patriotic grounds, but the particular opposition of these captains of industry is inspired by the base love of gain and of brutal autocratic power over their employees.

I am reminded of the opposition of these powerful employers by the adoption on yesterday by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of the fourth reservation to the covenant of the league of nations, from which reservation I quote:

> The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including * * * labor * * * are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"LABOR'S GREAT CHARTER."

In order to understand the significance of this reservation it is necessary to refer to Article 23 of the covenant, from which I quote:

ARTICLE 23.

> Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league—
> (a) Will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations.

I also quote from Part XIII of the annex to the covenant, being the provision relating to labor:

> Whereas the league of nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;
> And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled, and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required, as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease, and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons, and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education, and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries:

The high contracting parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

Following this preamble are Articles 387 to 427, which provide generally for the organization of a labor conference, international labor office, and so forth, and prescribe the rules and principles which shall govern in labor matters, including Article 427, which I quote:

ARTICLE 427.

The high contracting parties, recognising that the well-being, physical, moral, and intellectual, of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in Section I and associated with that of the league of nations.

They recognise that differences of climate, habits, and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition make strict uniformity in the conditions of labor difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding, as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labor conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods the principles the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance:

First. The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth. The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth. The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth. The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh. The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth. The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth. Each State should make provision for a system of inspection, in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the high contracting parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the league of nations, and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the league and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage earners of the world.

The labor provisions of the covenant have been called "Labor's Great Charter." They have met the approval of the leading thinkers and humanitarians of all the world as constituting one of the greatest things in the league of nations and as justifying its adoption though nothing else were accomplished.

The fourth reservation to which I have referred is directly aimed at the labor provisions of the covenant. It is clear to my mind that this reservation is intended to nullify them as far as possible and to leave the toiling masses of the nations a fair prey to all employers strong enough to exploit them. It is clear that it is proposed in response to a demand from some source for such action. The demand is not a public demand. It has not been voiced in the press. Its source is evidently in the oppressive employers who would rob labor of the protection which the covenant gives. Who are these employers who are secretly fighting the league of nations? I think I can answer that query in part at least. They are the coal operators of the United States.

COAL BARONS RAMPANT.

The National Coal Association is the organization of bituminous coal operators. It comprises some three-fourths of the total soft coal production. It is composed of representatives of various coal-producing districts. The directors of the National Coal Association held a meeting at Hotel Sinton in Cincinnati, Ohio, on June 19, 1919. There were present President H. N. Taylor, of Kansas City, and the following: George H. Barker, C. H. Jenkins, C. E. Bockus, J. C. Layne, jr., D. C. Botting, F. M. Lukins, J. G. Bradley, E. C. Mahan, John S. Brophy, A. M. Ogle, Ira Clemens, Philip Penna, J. D. Francis, Robert M. Randall, W. K. Field, S. H. Robbins, E. M. Gray, C. W. Taylor, A. R. Hamilton, J. J. Tierney, W. M. Henderson, F. C. Honnold, J. D. A. Morrow, and others. Erskine Ramsay, representing the Alabama Coal Operators' Association of my own State, was present at the meeting.

Practically the first order of business at this meeting of the directors of the National Coal Association was the consideration of the labor provisions of the covenant of the league of nations. I will quote the exact words spoken by various directors upon said subject, omitting for brevity statements not strictly germane:

President TAYLOR: * * * I have brought over with me and distributed among our members, so far as I had a sufficient number of copies of the pamphlet to do so, the labor plank in the league of nations program, which if it is adopted by the Congress in the league of nations, or rather by the Senate, will become practically the same as the Constitution of the United States and will not be subject to repeal or revision at any time. In that plank the right to organize and regulate working hours, the number of days per week and in vocational occupations of all kinds, is placed in the hands of a committee to be practically controlled by labor; and unless we as employers take some action we are going to find ourselves greatly handicapped in the running of our business. It has occurred to the chair that there should be a committee on industrial relations appointed, but the chair did not wish to take upon himself appointing that committee until he got the consent of this body as to the advisability of such appointment. The committee if appointed should be not a majority nonunion, but as these rights are being given to labor through that plank in the league of nations, it goes beyond anything that has been accomplished by the union in past years, everybody is vitally interested, both union and nonunion in this league. I wish we had enough pamphlets here so that everybody would have a copy of them on the floor, but we have not, but those who have them can loan them to such others of the members as wish to see them. Not wanting to do something that was in any way unpleasant or against the wishes of any part of our organization, I thought I had better bring this up to-day and get the sense of this meeting, and if it was the wish of the meeting that we then appoint a committee on industrial relations, so that somebody would be directly responsible for whatever effort this association cared to make in combating such a wholesale surrendering of our rights as that clause in that plank contains. It takes away most of our rights. If you read that you will see that the delegate has a right to deputize any agitator he wants to. In other words, they can bring in all kinds of agitators and vote away your rights. Something should be done to bring it before our Congressmen and Senators or else we are going to lose all our rights for the rest of our lives and for many generations to come. * * *

CALLS IT "WORLD-WIDE SOCIALISM."

J. D. FRANCIS: In going over this labor program of the league of nations, it seems to me to contemplate a world-wide socialism, a socialism of a kind and character and extent that even the socialists of five years ago would have thought most drastic. We can not depend upon the political officers of this country to look after our interests in this matter unless we stand behind our own interests. Our Representatives in Congress rarely hear from us on any of these subjects; we all wait for the other fellow to take the matter up with his Congressman, and we expect a little bit too much from him. While we are sitting idle the representatives of labor and the representatives of various organizations who are interested in having these things put through are carrying on year by year and day by day constant propaganda. We can not blame our Congressmen so much if they feel that the word that they get from these organizations is the correct view of the American people if that is the only word they get from their home associations. I think this association should take an active interest in matters of this kind, which are in their very nature political, and that we must, if we are to protect the interests not only of the coal industry but the interests of the United States of America, keep the form of our Government as it is to-day. We must get right down to these matters and fight for our rights. I think that this association, representing very largely the employing interests in these United States, should take an active interest in this matter and appoint a committee that will stand up and fight for the rights of the employer and the rights of the American citizen who believes in individual initiative and individual effort.

President TAYLOR: I might say that the National Lumbermen's Association, which is similar to the National Coal Association, is an organization composed of the different lumber associations all over the country, and they took action on this matter last week and have appointed a committee to represent the entire lumber industry of this country from the Pacific coast to the Gulf in their protest against this plank in the league of nations. The lumber mills, with very few exceptions, are nonunion and they figure that this plank absolutely takes their business out of their hands. They are very much worked up over it. I have a letter from their general council advising of their action and suggesting that this matter be laid before us. I think the lack of interest we have so far shown in it is due to the fact that none of us have received this matter before. I have not found anybody that has ever seemed to realize what was going on. It might be well, inasmuch as only a few of us have seen that, for our secretary to read at least the preamble.

The Secretary, Mrs. H. S. Taylor, then read an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, issue of June 9, 1919, page 852, the preamble, under "Part XIII, Labor," which I have already quoted.

President TAYLOR: The preamble covers about every phase of it about as wide as it can go; I do not know of anything that is left out of it. * * *

SUGGESTS A DISGUISE.

F. S. PEABODY: In discussing the problem of the league of nations if we pick out of this one plank particularly in the league of nations and come out as an association against that particular plank we are going to solidify, in my opinion, public opinion for the league of nations. I think we have got to look at the question in a very broad light. There is nothing that will bring the league of nations to a focus and get the approval of the people of the United States more quickly than by organizations of employers coming out against the league of nations on that particular plank. My feeling is that if we come out against the league of nations it wants to be on very much broader and bigger grounds. We want to come out on account of the Monroe doctrine or some other thing that will appeal to the people of the United States rather than solidifying the people of the United States for the league of nations. Personally, with as little knowledge as I have and as little knowledge as any one of the ordinary citizens of the country has in regard to the league of nations, I am definitely opposed to the league of nations being put in the peace treaty. If the league of nations goes through, I think it should be only after we have heard the reasons for it from Mr. Wilson and Mr. LODGE's reasons against it, and not until after we have had an opportunity to make a thorough analysis and to have analyses made by the leading and principal men of this country as to what the meaning of the league of nations is. If we come out now as the National Coal Association against the league of nations only on account of that labor plank, I think we are going to hasten our doom.

T. T. BREWSTER: If I understand it from what has been said, the action of this committee will be with reference to the preamble concerning labor in that league of nations document—that this committee is to report in regard to that clause or preamble in the league of nations. * * * If it is as I gathered from the language of the speaker who was talking when I came in, it was in reference to some influence or control upon legislation that the committee was to be appointed. If that be the fact, I believe that the committee on governmental relations could handle this question. If it is for the purpose of modifying or influencing legislation, it seems to me the matter should also be in the hands of the committee on governmental relations. * * *

IRA CLEMENS: I think it very essential that this committee should be appointed. We have to have some one who will look after the interests of this association and be able to keep them advised from time to time; and, as I understand it, this motion contemplates having somebody to do the work and be ready to report at any time that they deem advisable. * * *

F. C. HONNOLD. Since this is decidedly a governmental question, it belongs particularly to our governmental relations committee. If in the judgment of the meeting a similar committee would be more effective, let it be selected on the basis suggested of union and nonunion from the governmental relations committee. This probably is only one item out of numerous items that will come up during the next six months, all of which should be centered in the activities of the governmental relations committee, which, as a committee, has been definitely representative and thoroughly capable. I will sustain Mr. Brewster's motion to refer it to the governmental relations committee. * * *

President TAYLOR. As I understand it, there was a motion to appoint a committee, to be known as the industrial relations committee. Dr. Honnold now offers as a substitute motion to make reference of this matter to the governmental relations committee. * * *

"THOSE WITH ONE EYE ARE KINGS."

PHILIP PENNA. * * * I do not want the union operators, without the permission and consent and invitation from the nonunion operators, to interfere with the nonunion operators' rights in the matter; nor do I want them to interfere with the union operators' rights. At the present writing, because of the seeming competitive and complicated questions in the coal business, a great many of us are apt to think that the union operators' and nonunion operators' interests are crosswise, whereas if we would get behind the facts and get down to the last analysis, we shall find that all these relationships, instead of being crosswise, are identical, perhaps not to-day or to-morrow, but our industry is something that is going to last for long years, and our interests are not so opposed to each other as a mere glance at the situation would indicate. I can not but believe that the time has come from outside pressure, governmental pressure, public opinion, when we are going to have to revise to a very great extent our personal views of the industrial situation not only in this country but of the world; and we are going to have to recognize that fact, whether we like it or whether we dislike it. Some of these things that are so repugnant to-day that our President referred to, and which seem so offensive to any man that likes to feel that he is independent, we are going to have to swallow, gentlemen, as an industry, sooner or later. * * *

F. M. LUKINS. * * * So far this association has not had practically any labor troubles, but we can not expect that that is going to continue. The union operators are going to have their troubles, and probably the nonunion operators are going to have theirs. It would be very strange if they didn't. If Mr. Penna's proposition is correct, why, the nonunion operators are going to have plenty of them, because they are going to be unionized, according to that document there.

Personally, I do not think that this country is going to accept the league of nations as it is now drawn. I believe that they will adopt Mr. Peabody's view, and that it ought to be separated from the peace treaty and treated on its merits. If it is a good thing for the country, it will be adopted. If it is not a good thing, it will not be adopted. I believe there are so many different things about it that will be bad for this country that I do not believe the people will be for it. * * *

CALLS IT "TIN CAN ON DOG'S TAIL."

J. G. BRADLEY. * * * It would not make any difference to me if every member of it were a union operator, because this question is of so much importance not only to our coal industry but to every other business in which we are interested, and we are most of us interested in other businesses. We had no idea when President Wilson went abroad to negotiate a treaty that he was going to put into that treaty provisions which would give organized labor the status which it is proposed to give it here. I have great respect for the Constitution of the United States. * * * And here comes labor under the treaty clause of the Constitution and tacks this tin can onto the dog's tail, and that is the objection. * * *

J. J. TIERNEY. * * * If labor is given this chance under this treaty there are probably more hidden parts in there on which other legislation can be enacted. * * * Are we willing to part with the rights that we have under the Constitution and accept a treaty that means taking away from our rights or are we going to stand up and say that the Constitution is good enough for us and let this treaty go by the board? * * * I am bitterly opposed to it. I think the sooner this association—and every other association in the United States—gets to work and kills the thing, the better off we will all be. I think to-day that the lumber people and the manufacturers are taking the same view that we are. * * *

RUSH C. BUTLER. I do not rise to debate the question but merely to call your attention to the fact that inasmuch as the opinion, with reference to that provision of this league of nations seems to be unanimous as to the point involved here, it is up to us now to consider the manner in which you will handle this particular proposition. I say we seem to be a unit on the main idea. How shall we act upon it? * * * The question seems to be whether or not it is advisable to create a special committee to deal with this matter or whether it would be better to cover it up, so to speak, by referring it to the governmental relations committee. * * *

PHILIP PENNA. Let me ask you a question. Isn't it a fact that it is forced upon us now by governmental interference—by the league of nations, for instance, by our representatives in France, and isn't it a fact that that question is forced upon us now?

RUSH C. BUTLER. Yes; I think you are correct in that. * * *

PARLOR SOCIALISTS AND THE WHITE HOUSE.

PHILIP PENNA. * * * If I understand the situation at all, the labor unionists of the world have captured the French conference, and they have manipulated the whole proposition until their platform has practically suspended the Constitution of the United States. It very nearly gives them authority to go over there and agree upon their own appointees and their own conference and then come over here and tell the American Congress what to do and how to do it. There is no use for us to attempt for a moment to ignore the fact that we can not deal with this question without raising the issues of unionism or nonunionism. There is no other issue here except whether unionism shall control the legislature of the members of the league of nations, whether unionism shall control the industries of the countries that are parties to this league of nations, or whether the employers of labor shall control it. * * * As I see it, the issue is whether unionism is going to dominate the nations that are members of the league of nations or whether our legislatures and our constitutions are going to dominate. I hope that I am mistaken in saying that this league of nations is going to be accepted by the American people, but I do believe it, because it is so tied up and interwoven by the parlor socialists of America together with the White House at Washington that it is difficult to resist or reject the league of nations unless you turn down the peace treaty, too. * * *

F. M. LUKINS. I want to say that I am not in sympathy with Mr. Butler's idea of putting this thing off or covering it up, so far as that is concerned. My policy usually is not to cover up things, but to do them out in the open if we have to; but the thing that I want to emphasize right now is that something ought to be done about this thing, and done now. * * *

A. J. MALONEY. I want to say that certain phrases in there sound like some of the labor conventions. * * *

President TAYLOR. The question has been called for. * * * The entire matter will be referred to the governmental relations committee and the proper action will be taken by that committee, and I judge from the remarks here that action will be taken promptly. * * *

"AMERICANISM!"

The Government relations committee of the National Coal Association is as follows: A. R. Hamilton, chairman; T. T. Brewster, W. J. Carney, Ira Clemens, T. B. Davis, W. K. Field, W. H. Huff, A. J. Maloney, Philip Penna, Robert M. Randall, S. H. Robbins, W. J. Sampson, J. H. Wheelwright, and to this committee the opposition to the league of nations was committed. The committee held its meeting in Pittsburgh on July 30, and there took action upon the subject. I have no verbatim report of what was said and done at this meeting of the committee, but I am reliably informed that it was then decided to oppose the league of nations, and particularly the labor provisions of the covenant, in every way possible. I am informed that the committee agreed to act upon the suggestion which had been made by Mr. Peabody at the Hotel Sinton meeting of the directors, to place its objection to the league of nations ostensibly upon the broad ground of "Americanism" and opposition to the "internationalization of the United States."

Profiteers and patrioteers, exploiters of men, worshippers of mammon, drivers of industrial serfs! The czar of the steel industry arrogantly refuses to arbitrate differences with employees! An employers' group at the industrial conference stands like iron against granting one jot or tittle toward labor's just aspirations! Coal barons refuse to treat with their workers, and answer with Shylock's cynical legalism "It is so nominated in the bond," the appeal of those who toil under mountains to bring forth light and warmth for mankind!

How long, O Lord!

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under such necessary and proper rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant qualified under this act a prospecting permit, which shall give the exclusive right, for a period not exceeding two years, to prospect for oil or gas upon not to exceed 2,560 acres of land wherein such deposits belong to the United States and are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field upon condition that the permittee shall begin drilling operations within six months from the date of the permit, and shall, within one year from and after the date of permit, drill one or more wells for oil or gas to a depth of not less than 500 feet each, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, and shall, within two years from date of the permit, drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered. The Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to test the land in the time granted by the permit, extend any such permit for such time, not exceeding two years, and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe. Whether the lands sought in any such application and permit are surveyed or unsurveyed the applicant shall, prior to filing his application for permit, locate such lands in a reasonably compact form and according to the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys if the land be surveyed; and in an approximately square or rectangular tract if the land be an unsurveyed tract, the length of which shall not exceed two and one-half times its width, and if he shall cause to be erected upon the land for which a permit is sought a monument not less than 4 feet high, at some conspicuous place thereon, and shall post a notice in writing on or near said monument, stating that an application for permit will be made within 30 days after date of posting said notice, the name of the applicant, the date of the notice, and such a general description of the land to be covered by such permit by reference to courses and distances from such monument and such other natural objects and permanent monuments as will reasonably identify the land, stating the amount thereof in acres, he shall during the period of 30 days following such marking and posting be entitled to a preference right over others to a permit for the land so identified. The applicant shall, within 90 days after receiving a permit, mark each of the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments, so that the boundaries can be readily traced on the ground, and shall post in a conspicuous place upon the lands a notice that such permit has been granted and a description of the lands covered thereby: Provided, That in the Territory of Alaska prospecting permits not more than five in number may be granted to any qualified applicant for periods not exceeding four years, actual drilling operations shall begin within two years from date of permit, and oil and gas wells shall be drilled to a depth of not less than 500 feet, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered within three years from date of the permit and to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, within four years from date of permit: And provided further, That in said Territory the applicant shall have a preference right over others to a permit for land identified by temporary monuments and notice posted on or near the same for six months following such marking and posting, and upon receiving a permit he shall mark the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments within one year after receiving such permit.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. How does the total available area permitted to be granted under the provision of the bill for oil and gas compare with that which may go for coal? In either case it does not exceed 2,560 acres. For oil and gas are they limited to any particular sized tract?

Mr. SINNOTT. Under this section 13 the applicant gets a permit for not more than 2,560 acres. The size of that is discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior. He may not give him that much, but if he gives him that much, then on the discovery of oil he is entitled to a lease for one-fourth of that, and then he is entitled to certain preference rights in the balance over the one-fourth.

Mr. WALSH. Why in the case of coal was it limited to 40-acre tracts or multiples thereof?

Mr. SINNOTT. He can get as high as 2,560 acres under coal, but that is an outright lease. This is a permit, really an oil-prospecting permit, and under the coal proposition, if the land is known coal land, it is leased outright under a royalty bid. The multiples are made so that the Secretary may have convenient forms under the 2,560 acres. Section 13 is on unknown or wildcat territory.

Mr. WALSH. For the purpose of going in and drilling wells and finding out if there is oil or gas under the surface somewhere?

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALSH. But in the case of coal lands, the Secretary's discretion is limited somewhat by the size of the tracts being restricted to 40 acres or multiples thereof?

Mr. SINNOTT. He can make any multiple of 40 acres—that is, on land that is already classified as coal lands—and dispose of it by leasing.

Mr. WALSH. In 40-acre blocks?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; lease it.

Mr. WALSH. The oil lands are not platted, as I understand it.

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. WALSH. And the Secretary, in his discretion, can give a man a permit to prospect on 2,560 acres all in one tract?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the maximum.

Mr. WALSH. And if he strikes oil in one corner of that, he can get a lease for one-quarter of it?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Why is so large a proportion of the 2,560-acre tract permitted to be leased?

He may find oil in just one corner of that 2,560-acre tract, and the Secretary's discretion is limited to giving him a lease for one-fourth of the tract or not at all?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why is that done? Now, if there is a tract of 2,560 acres, and he wanders around there in the wilderness——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. And finds oil in one corner, why do they have to give him a lease for that number of acres?

Mr. SINNOTT. Now, he may be right upon the edge of what is called the oil structure. He may be over in the corner, and he may make a discovery of oil down here in very small quantities. The body of the oil may be over here at another place upon the 2,560 acres. This is to encourage men to go out in the undeveloped and wildcat territory and assure them of enough oil land to justify them in going ahead and making these enormous expenditures that they do have to make in exploring for oil.

Mr. WALSH. They do not have a prospecting privilege for coal?

Mr. SINNOTT. In certain cases they have for coal.

Mr. WALSH. But not on such a plan as this?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; not on such a plan as this.

Mr. WALSH. Why is it that they give this privilege of prospecting for oil——

Mr. SINNOTT. It is necessary to encourage people to go out. This is a very hazardous game. For instance, in the State of California $300,000,000 have been expended without the return of a dollar. In the State of Wyoming some 60 or 70, possibly more, of what are called oil structures or domes have been drilled, and there are only 3 or 4 that pay.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of directing the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language of line 23, page 49. I note there that you require drilling to a certain depth unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that the universal custom in preparing oil and gas leases and providing for the depth or such conditions as you have here, both in the Interior Department on Osage leases of restricted Indian lands and in private business, is to make the language read, "that unless oil and gas deposits in paying quantities shall be sooner discovered." And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that language is more definite because that language would bring the measure of the value of the deposit, whereas there would always be some question under the language as it exists.

Mr. SINNOTT. That language was put in with a great deal of consideration, and we would not like to change from "valuable" to "paying." There is quite a distinction. We are in line with the decisions of the courts as to what is a discovery, and I think it would be a very dangerous matter to experiment with this language at this time.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, for the purpose of getting some information from the committee. I desire to call the attention of the committee to line 25, page 47, where it reads, "such deposits belong to the United States and are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field." I would like to inquire how these fields are known and designated, so that a person who wanted to go and prospect in this wildcat country would know that he was in that kind of a territory?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, he would ascertain that when he made application of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior would inform him, "You are applying for a permit in what we deem to be a known geological structure, and you are not entitled to a permit in that kind of a structure, but you have to apply for a lease on a bidding proposition."

Mr. JEFFERIS. Well, on these known geological structure fields, so called, are there any wells in existence now?

Mr. SINNOTT. There are a number of wells in the known geological structure. But this section 13 refers to what is not in a known geological structure. I think your provision comes up in another section, relating to known geological structure of producing fields.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Are these known geological sections already being operated, or are they just pushed to one side for the present?

Mr. SINNOTT. Some of them are being operated fully and some of them are only being partially operated, because they are within withdrawn territory.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Would not the committee think it would be proper to give the prospectors the right to prospect within a certain distance of wells that are already located in these fields, so as to open up the territory?

Mr. SINNOTT. We had that in the bill last year, and that would result in this, in giving a prospecting permit on a known geological structure of a producing field; and the Government desires, and it is the desire of the committee where there is a known structure, to make that a leasing proposition, and not a prospecting-permit proposition.

Mr. JEFFERIS. In other words, that would be taken care of in another portion of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is taken care of in section 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That upon establishing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of oil or gas have been discovered within the limits of the land embraced in any permit, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-fourth of the land embraced in the prospecting permit: Provided, That the permittee shall be granted a lease for as much as 160 acres of said lands, if there be that number of acres within the permit. The area, to be selected by the permittee, shall be in compact form and, if surveyed, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such surveys; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose, and any excess deposits may be repaid to the person or persons making such deposit or their legal representatives. Such leases shall be for a term of 20 years upon a royalty of 5 per cent in amount or value of the production and the annual payment in advance of a rental of $1 per acre, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year, with the right of renewal as prescribed in section 17 hereof. The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in his prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production, and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act, the royalty to be determined by competitive bidding or fixed by such other method as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary shall have the right to reject any or all bids.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the distinguished chairman of the committee if, in view of the fact, which I think is the fact, that this is the natal day of one of our distinguished Members, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], if he does not think, perhaps, it also being Saturday, the committee ought to rise?

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SINNOTT. I recognize the importance of the first reason assigned by the gentleman, but I was in hopes that we could run until 5 o'clock, or until we reached section 18—just another page.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has no objection to desecrating his birthday, all right.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think this question ought to be recognized, and I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Because it is his natal day?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but because there are about 100 men in this Capitol who are in the employ of this country, and who have got to do their marketing this evening for to-morrow, and we ought to think of them at least once a week.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the House substitute for the bill S. 2775, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENTRY OF ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a conference report on the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, for printing under the rule.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 10156, a bill that I introduced, for the purpose of creating foreign trade zones.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. What bill is that, Mr. Speaker, may I ask?

Mr. NOLAN. A bill for the creation of foreign trade zones.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A bill for the creation of foreign trade zones, introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. BLANTON. If they are the gentleman's own remarks, I shall not object; but if it is the insertion of other matter, I shall object.

Mr. NOLAN. They are my own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 1 o'clock on Monday, in honor of the birthday of the great American, Theodore Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock on Monday, in honor of the birthday of the late Theodore Roosevelt. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, is there any exercise proposed in connection with that?

Mr. UPSHAW. I do not know that there is any in the House. There is to be an exercise in one of the theaters here in the city.

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me it would be more appropriate for the House to meet at the regular time and adjourn earlier than usual in the afternoon, if it is thought best.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW]?

Mr. MAPES. I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, for the remainder of the day.

To Mr. HARDY of Texas, for 10 days, on account of campaign work and attention to personal affairs.

To Mr. GALLIVAN, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his brother.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3076. An act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdiction, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, October 27, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MICHENER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to which was referred the bill (S. 597) providing for an increase of salary for the United States marshal and district attorney for the western district and for the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 416), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 222) directing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 415), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8918) granting a pension to Janet Millage; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 2610) to provide for the disposal of certain waste and drainage water from the Yuma projects, Ariz.; Committee on the Public Lands discharged, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MANN of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 10180) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the cities of Sumter and Orangeburg, and to the towns of Lexington, St. Matthews, and Bishopville, all in South Carolina, each a German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10181) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Columbia, S. C., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SWEET: A bill (H. R. 10182) to regulate the interstate use of automobiles and all self-propelled vehicles which use the public highways in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 10183) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MANN of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 10184) for the purchase of a post-office site at Bishopville, S. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10185) for the purchase of a post-office site at St. Matthews, S. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10186) for the purchase of a post-office site at Batesburg, S. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 10187) to change the place of holding the United States district court for the western division, northern district of Illinois, and for maintaining the clerk's office therein; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCOTT: A bill (H. R. 10188) authorizing the Ottawa and Chippewa Tribes of Indians of Michigan to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ALMON: A bill (H. R. 10189) to authorize the enlargement, extension, and remodeling the Federal building at Huntsville, Ala.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GARLAND: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 10190) granting an increase of pension to William Ralston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENISON: A bill (H. R. 10191) granting a pension to Philip White; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAYS: A bill (H. R. 10192) granting a pension to Samuel Baker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 10193) granting an increase of pension to Emma M. Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEA of California: A bill (H. R. 10194) granting a pension to Lizzie C. Lefavor; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LONERGAN: A bill (H. R. 10195) for the relief of John G. Barnard; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10196) granting a pension to Robert Herron; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10197) granting a pension to Margaret Steele; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10198) granting a pension to Fanny Stewart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MANN of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 10199) granting a pension to George Crago; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RAMSEYER: A bill (H. R. 10200) for the relief of Sanford Kirkpatrick; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 10201) granting a pension to Alvina Sanders; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 10202) granting a pension to Calvers T. Biddle; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10203) granting an increase of pension to Lazarus W. Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 10204) for the relief of John Baker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of Ukrainian National Committee of United States Branch, of Philadelphia, praying that the troops of Poland, Roumania, and any other power foreign to Ukraine be ordered withdrawn immediately from all Ukrainian territories; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of J. L. Sturtevant, of Milwaukee, Wis., favoring the establishment of an independent and adequate news service across the Pacific with a low word rate; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Montana State Press Association, of Great Falls, Mont., protesting against the repeal of the zone system of postage on newspapers and periodicals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of Chicago Wheel & Manufacturing Co. and Cotta Transmission Co., of Rockford, Ill., favoring the passage of House bills 5011, 5012, and 7010; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Boston Chapter, Knights of Columbus, protesting against the ruling made by the Secretary of War relative to the chaplains who served during the recent war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MacGREGOR: Petition of Board of Supervisors of Erie County, Buffalo, N. Y., favoring the passage of the bill introduced by Representative DALLINGER, of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MEAD: Petition of Board of Supervisors of Erie County, Buffalo, N. Y., favoring the passage of the bill introduced by Representative DALLINGER, of Massachusetts, in re sugar embargo; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ROWAN: Petition of David Metzger, of New York, urging the importance of providing adequate transportation facilities and uninterrupted transportation for the public; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of J. H. Bleistein (Inc.), of New York, favoring the passage of House bill 9778; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of G. W. Berry, of New York, favoring the passage of House bill 9694; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, petition of Daniel T. O'Connell and Anne Kearns, of New York, urging that the Congress of the United States by resolution ask the President of the United States to recognize the Republic of Ireland as a member of the nations of the world; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., protesting against sending of troops of the United States Army to Europe; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, October 27, 1919.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, October 22, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harding	McKellar	Sherman
Bankhead	Harris	McLean	Simmons
Borah	Harrison	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Henderson	Moses	Smith, Ga.
Capper	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Md
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Spencer
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sterling
Cummins	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Kenyon	Nugent	Thomas
Dial	Keyes	Overman	Townsend
Dillingham	King	Page	Trammell
Edge	Kirby	Penrose	Underwood
France	Knox	Phipps	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	Lenroot	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
Gronna	McCormick	Robinson	Watson
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are absent on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained by illness in their families. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] are detained from the Senate on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. The pending question is upon the first amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending question.

GEORGIA RESOLUTION OF 1852.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have here a resolution passed in 1852 by the Legislature of the State of Georgia. It is a little old, but there are some suggestions in it that some of us may consider wise. I bring it to the attention of the Senate particularly on account of the fact that it was approved by Howell Cobb, who was then governor of Georgia, and who had been Speaker of the House of Representatives, and was afterwards Secretary of the Treasury. It was presented to the House of Representatives by Alexander H. Stephens, afterwards Vice President of the Confederacy. Gov. Howell Cobb and Alexander H. Stephens were two of Georgia's greatest sons. Although I do not claim that the resolution is entirely applicable, and although I do not myself profess to attempt to follow it entirely, yet it does carry a line of thought that may be valuable to us even in these progressive days, and I desire to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Alexander H. Stephens, a Representative from Georgia, March 9, 1852, presented joint resolutions of the Georgia Legislature, approved by Gov. Howell Cobb, to wit:

"'It has been the policy of the American Government from its earliest existence to maintain friendly relations with all but entangling alliances with none. Our true mission is not to propagate our opinions or impose upon other countries our form of government, by artifice or by force, but to show by our success, moderation, and justice the blessings of self-government and the advantages of free institutions. Let every people choose for themselves, and make and alter their political institutions to suit their own condition and circumstances. In proclaiming and adhering to the doctrine of neutrality and non-intervention the United States have not followed the lead of other civilized nations, but have taken the lead and been followed by others. These great principles proclaimed in the days of Washington and Jefferson are the great American principles upon which our Government has ever stood. The fame and distinction to which we have attained as a people, the great blessings which we have dispensed to the world in affording an asylum for the oppressed everywhere, forbid that we should for a moment cherish the idea of abandoning those principles. We sympathize with the oppressed, we tender them a home, but never will we join with the ambitious or the revengeful in a crusade against other nations, whatever may be their domestic policy.

"'A departure from this safe and correct rule would involve our Government in endless disputes and endless wars, the result of which the wisest statesmanship can not foresee. Our policy should be to observe good faith and justice toward all nations, cultivate peace and harmony with all. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of a republican government. In extending our commercial relations we should have as little political connection as possible with foreign nations. Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?'"

THREATENED STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Saturday last I introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) assuring the national administration of the unqualified support of the Congress in dealing with the impending strike of coal miners in the United States, and I at that time announced that I would call it up and submit some remarks to the Senate in support of it this morning. In the interval the President has issued a very heartening, commendable, unmistakable, and patriotic announcement committing the administration to the preservation of law and order and to the enforcement of the right of every man in the country to enjoy the privileges and rights of citizenship. Hence I do not think that any discussion is necessary. I ask unanimous consent, however, to call up the joint resolution for passage.

Mr. LODGE. I will be very glad to have the joint resolution taken up and acted on at once, if it involves no debate.

Mr. THOMAS. I assure the Senator that if it does involve discussion I will withdraw it.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask to have the joint resolution read?

Mr. LODGE. I reserve the right to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the officers of the United Mine Workers of America have ordered all miners in the bituminous coal mines of the United States to strike on Saturday, the 1st day of November next, notwithstanding efforts of the Secretary of Labor to secure some basis of negotiation suspending or preventing same; and

Whereas the representatives of said organization have arbitrarily rejected the President's earnest counsel for compromise; and

Whereas strikes in other fields of industry heretofore ordered and still unsettled threaten to continue indefinitely; and

Whereas demands for increased wages and shorter hours, accompanied by expressed or implied determination to enforce such demands, if necessary, by strikes in other fields of industry, have been and are being made; and

Whereas the threatened strike of the bituminous coal miners will, if carried into effect, interfere with, injure, or suspend nearly all the national pursuits and industries, inflict continued and incredible hardship and suffering upon all the people of the United States and provoke disorder, violence, bloodshed, and insurrection throughout the land; and

Whereas the enforcement of the law and the maintenance of order for the security of life and property and the protection of the individual citizen in the exercise of his constitutional rights is the first and paramount duty of the Government and must be at all times vigorously and effectively safeguarded by the use of every means essential to that end: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That we hereby give the national administration and all others in authority the assurance of our constant, continuous, and unqualified support in the great emergency confronting us, and call upon them to vindicate the majesty and power of the Government in enforcing obedience to and respect for the Constitution and the laws, and in fully protecting every citizen in the maintenance and exercise of his lawful rights and the observance of his lawful obligations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know what the program of the administration is. With the statement of the general principles which are embodied in the resolution which has just been read for the maintenance of law and order, of course, we all agree; but as to how that shall be effectuated is a very serious proposition. I repeat, I do not know what the program is; neither do I understand that the administration has put out any program. I do not want to indorse a program until I know what it is.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Colorado will state what he understands the program to be, I might entirely agree with him.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not concerned with programs so much as I am with the protection of the people of the United States, the preservation of order, and the enforcement of law. The Senator from Idaho has read the President's statement, I have no doubt.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, I have; and, as a general statement, I agree with it.

Mr. THOMAS. The joint resolution was introduced prior to the appearance of that statement. The purpose which I had in mind was to give assurance to those in authority whose duty it is to execute the law that the Congress of the United States was behind them in such action. If the Senator from Idaho desires to offer any suggestion by way of amendment or change in phraseology, I shall gladly accept that. I care nothing for phraseology so long as it outlines what I have in mind and accomplishes the purpose intended, that purpose being to place behind those in authority the moral support, and, if necessary, the actual support of the Congress of the United States in this emergency, which I regard as quite as serious as any which ever confronted us. That is my purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, this is a Government of law and order; we are all in favor of maintaining law and preserving order; and, so far as that general proposition is concerned, I presume there can be no difference of opinion in this Chamber. If the time arrives when violence is used or disorder is relied upon by the labor forces to accomplish their ends, we shall certainly be a unit; but the program as to how this difficulty should be settled is a program which has not yet been divulged, so far as I have seen; and I am thoroughly out of harmony with the program which has been announced by Mr. Gary and his friends. When a gentleman who represents the highest form of organized capital in the world refuses even to meet with organized labor, I am not in sympathy with him. I do not believe that either labor or capital can take the position of refusing to meet the representatives of the other.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not care, as I stated, to take up the time of the Senate if any discussion is to be had of the joint resolution upon the floor. I have twice criticized and condemned the attitude of Mr. Gary in the strike to which the Senator from Idaho refers; I wish his position had been otherwise; but, Mr. President, we have got beyond that, and we are now confronting a situation which makes a consideration of the causes which produced it secondary to the need for providing against it. We can, of course, wait until there are a number of overt acts; but prevention is better than cure; indeed, an ounce of prevention is said to be worth more than a pound of cure; and I had hoped that the moral effect of a positive declaration by Congress upon this question might be deterrent, and by that means prevent the occurrence of conditions which I gravely apprehend will develop in the next few days. That was my purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, how does the Senator from Colorado understand that the administration is going to effectuate the protection of citizens?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. I want to know before I indorse the program.

Mr. THOMAS. Neither do I know how tumults, disorder, insurrection, the assaults on nonstriking workmen, the infliction of cold and hunger upon the people are going to be effectuated; I do not know what the details are going to be; but I feel that we are confronted with that situation; and that it is the duty of the American Congress to take an American stand upon the subject.

Mr. BORAH. If I knew what the stand was, I might agree that it was an American stand; but I do not know what the program is; I do not know how it is intended to do this. If it is intended simply to call out the militia and to start in at once to decimate the people with whom there is a controversy, I am opposed to it. If there is a program on hand under which we are to bring the forces together and undertake to arrange the matter upon a basis of settlement which is just and fair to all, of course, I am in favor of it; but I do not know what the program is. It is stated this morning that the Attorney General has a program which has not yet been announced. It may be entirely in accord with my views; but the pending resolution indorses a program as yet unknown.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the resolution indorses whatever the authorities whom the people have placed in charge of this Government have determined to do.

Mr. BORAH. I will not indorse that kind of a program.

Mr. THOMAS. They do not propose to decimate any portion of the public; we know that. We have the history of America before us; we know what the constitutional prerogatives of men are; we know what the constitutional limitations of the Government are. Surely the Senator from Idaho does not for a moment assume that any program of decimation is going to be instituted either by way of anticipation or otherwise; but a program of protection is essential. If the Government fails, as I now believe it will not fail, it is an essential program in this emergency. Of course, if the Senator desires to have the matter go over, my promise to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations stands good, and I will withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on Saturday I introduced a Senate resolution with relation to the abduction of Mr. William O. Jenkins, American consular agent at Puebla, Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I say a word?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall endeavor to secure favorable consideration of the joint resolution to-morrow morning.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield to me, I assume under the circumstances the joint resolution of the Senator from Colorado will lie on the table?

Mr. THOMAS. I so understand.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I repeat that on Saturday last I introduced Senate resolution No. 220, with reference to the abduction of William O. Jenkins, American consular agent at Puebla, Mexico, and I announced that I should ask for action on the resolution to-day. However, inasmuch as there is to be no morning hour to-day, and in view of the fact that it is reported in a morning newspaper of this city to-day that Mr. Jenkins has been restored to his freedom, I will not at this time ask for action on the resolution. I will wait until I learn if the report of Mr. Jenkins's rescue is true. I hope it may be true; and, if true, of course, there would be no need for action on my resolution at any time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if in withdrawing his resolution——

Mr. MYERS. I am not withdrawing the resolution; I am merely saying that I will not ask for action on it to-day. I could not do so in any event, because there is to be no morning hour to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, in passing over his resolution for the time being, I should like to ask the Senator whether it would not be a good idea to amend the resolution by making it a joint resolution of Congress, appropriating a sum of money to constitute a fund out of which from time to time ransoms may be paid for United States citizens and officials who are captured and held for tribute in Mexico?

Mr. MYERS. No; I am not in favor of that. The Senator apparently has not read my resolution. My resolution is of directly an opposite character. I suggest simply that the resolution lie on the table for further developments, and I may or may not at some time in the future call it up, according to what the developments may be. I will not, however, call it up to-day.

EXEMPTION OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS UNDER ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, without reading, a short statement upon the labor situation. I do not care to take the time of the Senate to read it, but would like to have unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection.

Mr. President, I wish to go on with the subject before us and I shall be forced to object to ordinary morning business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask what is the nature of the statement presented by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. It is a statement of my own, prepared by me, giving a notice of an intention to introduce a bill later.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is against the universal practice of the Senate to print such a statement in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. EDGE. I merely made the request that it be inserted in the RECORD in order to save time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I supposed that it was a statement from the outside. Under the rules of the Senate the Senator can not introduce into the RECORD a statement or a speech written by himself without reading it.

Mr. EDGE. If I had the floor, I could read the statement, I presume.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. My only object was to save the time of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is not a time-saving institution.

Mr. LODGE. We can not save time in that way. I am afraid the Senator will have to read the statement when he addresses the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. I bow to the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Under the rules of the House the printing of addresses and speeches by Members without reading is allowed, but it has never been permitted in the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. But when a Senator gets the floor at any time he may read such a statement?

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably; but it is not possible under the rules of the Senate to print such a statement without reading. That is one of their defects, perhaps.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator objects——

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to its being read on the floor. Of course, I could not avail anything by such an objection, even if I desired to object.

Mr. EDGE. It will take only about three minutes to read the statement.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not do any good for any Senator to object.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it would not do any good to object.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understood that my colleague was recognized, and that he presented a statement and was given permission to print it in the RECORD without objection.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know, and I do not think anybody knew, that it was a statement of his own; I supposed it was a statement prepared by outside parties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair could not permit it to go into the RECORD at any event. There is a rule of the Senate that a Senator can not print his remarks in the RECORD without reading. He must read them or deliver them from the floor of the Senate. That is all there is to it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I can get the floor——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can speak on the pending amendment of the treaty. That would be in perfect order.

Mr. EDGE. Then I desire to take about three minutes speaking on the amendment now pending.

Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate, with scarcely more than a majority present, and with little debate and apparently still less consideration as to its effect, defeated by the close vote of 28 to 31 a proposed amendment to a pending appropriation bill, which amendment would have prevented the exemption of labor union and agricultural organizations from prosecution even on evidence or indication that such organizations were violating the provisions of the Clayton or antitrust laws.

Since that action the conference participated in by representatives of the public, of labor, and of the employers has broken up through their inability to agree on a form of so-called collective bargaining. A natural result of this unfortunate disagreement would seem to indicate further combat between at least two of these groups, the seriousness of which hardly can be estimated.

To the rank and file of the people, I believe, it will at least seem strange that at the very time when labor was squaring off—in some cases, I fear, taking the law into its own hands—the United States Senate should pass legislation exempting it from punishment if it violate the antitrust law or any statutes prohibiting combinations "in restraint of trade." Of course, I appreciate that it can be said that labor is not exempt if it actually violate any law; but the mere exemption from prosecution, even though to some extent qualified, is, in my judgment, a very dangerous indication of the Senate's willingness that labor or any other class or group should be practically immune from the provisions of this act. Of course, it can not be gainsaid that combinations in restraint of trade are just as possible on the part of one class as on the part of another.

And right here it may be well to emphasize the fact, of which both labor and capital seem ignorant or intolerant, that labor is not the employee of capital but of the people at large, of the whole United States, and that the people are the employer of capital also. The people pay capital for the use of its money and its services; they pay labor for its manual work and its time. When labor imposes unwarranted wages on capital through threats or coercion, it does not wring such wages from capital, but from the ultimate consumer—the people. To such an extreme did capital once go that State and national legislation was enacted to restrain it from oppression. Especially in these times it seems to me that the other employee of the people also should be held within reasonable bounds.

It is no argument to advance that the antitrust law has been disregarded in other directions. I do not doubt that this is true. But, Mr. President, two wrongs do not make a right, and when Congress deliberately legislates that a special class shall be exempt from the law or any investigation of possible infractions of the law, then it seems to me that Congress directly infers that the classes so exempted are to be beyond control by legislation and immune from investigation or prosecution and deliberately invites a disregard of the law. Certainly the very terms of the section in the appropriation bill which is providing a fund for just such investigation justify this view.

Of course there are many combinations of farmers and laboring men which in no way trespass on the antitrust act; if they do not, then they have nothing to fear; but if they do, they certainly should not be exempt. Surely, at this critical time above all others, even to state by inference that they are to an extent beyond the purview of investigation furnishes that much official encouragement for those who are not impressed with the law to become just that much bolder.

Under the circumstances it has appealed to me as being of such tremendous importance, with the miners threatening to strike, with shipping tied up, the steel men out, the railroad men restless, and the labor conference disrupted by disagreement, that surely the people of this country deserve from their representatives in Congress more positive help and affirmative cooperation than such an act would seem to give. I therefore give notice that at the proper time, unless some better method be devised, I shall introduce a bill to repeal that section of the deficiency appropriation bill, if it becomes a law, which would recognize any class as having a special privilege through an act of Congress.

I was very much impressed with the exposé of related conditions as recently portrayed by my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and I trust through the deliberations of the special committee of which he is chairman a still more permanent solution may be effected.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had intended, in connection with the resolution which I presented, to call attention also to quite an interesting cablegram from Paris that has appeared in the press within the last few days. It is from Louis Edgar Browne. It is a description of the condition of affairs in Arabia, and calls attention to the fact that Ebin Sooud has gathered around him three-quarters of the Arabian tribes and is moving with military power through the Provinces of Yemen and Aser; but the important, the material part of the cablegram, is the fact that he has invaded Hedjaz, that he has overrun the northern part of Hedjaz, and is threatening the holy city of Mecca.

I call attention to this fact and ask that the cablegram be printed in the RECORD in order that we may clearly understand by this illustration the attitude we would occupy under article 10 if the treaty and the covenant of the league were adopted without reservation. If we were in the league with no reservation as to article 10, the moral obligation would be upon us to take action at once to help preserve the territory and political independence of Hedjaz, for Hedjaz is one of the countries included in the league, and under the covenant we would at once send our men to Arabia to help protect Hedjaz from these Arabian forces.

It may be that we all wish to do so. It may be that the American people are in favor of it, but as we move along I only thought it well that we should know of this event, brought to our attention through the press, as it helps to make us appreciate just what we are about to do if we adopt the covenant of the league without reservations.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator will agree that it is fortunate that the disturbance takes place before the league is adopted, rather than afterwards.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not discussing that. I am asking the public generally to think about it, and to see how they feel about it. Will not the people of this country prefer to avoid a committal in advance to enter war, and, understanding the situation, will they not prefer for Congress to be left, without prior moral obligation to enter war, but free to act as each trouble arises?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITAIN'S PROGRAM FOR ISLAM UPSET—PLANS FOR DOMINATING INTELLECTUAL ELEMENTS DISJOINTED BY PURITAN ARAB.

[By Louis Edgar Browne.]

PARIS, FRANCE, October 22.

British plans for dominating the intellectual elements of the Mohammedan world through the shifting of the moral forces of Islam from the Ottoman caliphat to the sherif of Mecca have been rudely disjointed by a virile religious revival led by a Puritan Arab, Ebin Sooud, to whom three-quarters of the Arabian Tribes have already sworn allegiance. It is reported that his military forces, largely armed by the Turks, have swept through various oases of the Arabian desert and conquered and obtained the allegiance of the Provinces of Yemen and Aser, as well as the northern half of Hedjaz. It also is said that the city of Mecca itself is about to be besieged.

HUSSEIN SUPPORTED BY BRITISH.

Sherif Hussein was supported in his movement to break away from Constantinople by the British. The independence of the Kingdom of Hedjaz, of which he is temporal and spiritual head, was strongly aided by certain British colonial pioneers, who undoubtedly saw in the maneuver a possibility of controlling the Mohammedans of the world, as well as protecting the Suez Canal and the route to India. Though it was the British who brought Emir Feizal, son of Sherif Hussein, to Paris to make his plea before the peace conference for an Arabian confederation in the Ottoman Empire, certain Arab and Turkish intellectuals believe that Great Britain's policy regarding Arabia was created to offset trouble among the separatists in British Mohammedan colonies.

For a long time the world has known that England has been having trouble with her 60,000,000 Mohammedans in India and the millions of Mohammedans in Egypt. Certain Arabs and Turks say the British charge that this trouble is not due to misrule, but to machinations of the Ottoman Sultan, the committee of union and progress, and, in general, the new Persian movement. They declare that to destroy this spiritual influence over the unruly Mohammedans in the British colonies the English foreign policy has sought to discredit, ridicule, and destroy the power of the Turkish caliphat and to upbuild in its place the caliphat of Mecca, over which Great Britain herself could hold virtual power of dictation.

METHODS ADOPTED BY EBIN SOOUD.

While Ebin Sooud is not allied or subservient to the Turkish Government—as a matter of fact, he is hostile to it—he has made this argument to discredit throughout the Arabian Peninsula, England and Sherif Hussein simultaneously. Millions of proclamations have been printed and distributed alleging the above supposition to be a fact. These proclamations accuse Hussein of being nothing more nor less than a hireling, a British agent, a scoundrel, and a traitor, who sold his country for a certain stipulated quantity of British gold per month.

Whether the assertions of Ebin Sooud regarding the British-Arabian intrigue are true or not, it makes little difference, because the accusations have been published broadcast. Many Arabians believe them to be true, and consequently the number of adherents to Ebin Sooud's movement is increasing by leaps and bounds.

ADVOCATES RELIGIOUS REFORM.

In addition to the patriotic appeal to his country to save Arabia from becoming a vasal State of England, Ebin Sooud had adopted a formula of religious reform. Turks and Arabs with whom I have talked in the Orient say that his movement corresponds largely to the early Protestant movements in Christianity. These Turks and Arabs alike hope that the movement will result in the purification and simplification of Islam, which will give it renewed life and vigor.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. The Committee on Education and Labor have formulated a bill which is known as the Americanization bill as a substitute for the bill which is now before that committee. I am anxious to present the bill and the report, but in doing so I should like about 10 minutes to explain the purposes of the bill, and to make a few remarks. I could present the report, if the Senator would consent, at this time, and later submit my remarks, or, if the Senator is going to object, I will refrain until he is out of the Chamber, and then ask permission to make the report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have objected to morning business. The object of taking a recess is to avoid the delays caused by morning business. If we are to press this treaty, which I desire to do, I am obliged to object to the introduction of morning business. In fairness, if I object to one, I must object to all. Of course I can put no restraint on what the Senator may choose to say on any subject, whether I am in the Chamber or out, so long as he is addressing himself to the amendment now pending.

Mr. KENYON. I should certainly address myself to that amendment, but I was anxious that what I might say should be coupled up with the bill and with the report, so I will wait a while longer, until the Senator leaves the Chamber.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8272) to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt; and

H. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8272. An act to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Forest Park and Union Course Taxpayers' Association of Woodhaven, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of the Educational Council of New Hampshire, praying for the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the Women's Republican Club of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Technical Association of the Pulp and Paper Industry, of Chicago, Ill., praying for an appropriation for a special investigation into the decay of pulpwood and woodpulp, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of the Women's Republican Club of New York City, N. Y., and a memorial of the Cook County Ladies' Auxiliary, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 277) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2912) to appropriate funds for the immigration inspection of the Department of Labor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Immigration, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3309) to correct the military record of William N. Buck (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3310) granting an increase of pension to Fanny M. Jones (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 3311) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 3312) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of the heirs of Isabella Ann Fluker; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 3313) granting a pension to William A. Moore (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3314) for the relief of Robert C. Wilcox (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3318) for the relief of Willis B. Cross; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAY OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to introduce, as in legislative session, the bill which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is very short.

The bill (S. 3316) to provide for the pay of officers and enlisted men of the Army when engaged in work essential to the continuance of the facilities of interstate or foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

A bill (S. 3316) to provide for the pay of officers and enlisted men of the Army when engaged in work essential to the continuance of the facilities of interstate or foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 35 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 35. Enlisted men prohibited from civil employment: Hereafter no enlisted man in the active service of the United States, in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, respectively, whether a noncommissioned officer, musician, or private, shall be detailed, ordered, or permitted to leave his post to engage in any pursuit, business, or performance in civil life, for emolument, hire, or otherwise, when the same shall interfere with the customary employment and regular engagement of local civilians in the respective arts, trades, or professions; but the President may assign or detail officers or enlisted men to perform work or labor essential to the continued operation of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate or foreign commerce which has been abandoned, or substantially obstructed, prevented, or interfered with, as the result of a strike, lockout, or other labor disturbance. An officer or enlisted man so detailed or assigned, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall, in addition to his usual pay and allowances, be entitled to and may receive from the person, association, or corporation for whose direct benefit such work or labor is performed the prevailing rate of wages in the locality for the same or similar work."

PUNISHMENT OF SEDITION.

Mr. STERLING. As in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that the bill may be read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, after which reference I ask leave to make a further report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 3317) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STERLING. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make a favorable report on the bill just referred to it, and I ask that the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ENTRY OF ALIENS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "and shall continue in force and effect until and including the 4th day of March, 1921"; and the Senate agree to the same.

H. C. LODGE,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
P. J. McCUMBER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
H. D. FLOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 144).

Mr. WARREN. I submit the conference report on the first deficiency appropriation bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 10, 12, 28, 31, 34, 35, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 55, 62, 63, 64, 72, and 73.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 7, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 36, 37, 38, 39, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 58, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

"Authority is hereby granted the director of the Council of National Defense to expend during the fiscal year 1920 the sum of $32,000 from the funds now to the credit of the committee on public information for necessary expenses incurred therefor since July 1, 1919, and for the expenses of auditing and closing the accounts and affairs of said committee. All unexpended balances of appropriations for and allotments to the committee on public information shall remain available for payment under the direction of the director of the Council of National Defense of such liabilities as were actually and necessarily incurred by the committee prior to June 30, 1919: Provided, That $1,000,000 of such appropriations and allotments shall be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "continuing" and insert in lieu thereof the word "completing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five," and in line 6 strike out "$1,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after line 15; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,863,176"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

"Ordnance reservation civilian schools: Authority is granted for the expenditure during the fiscal year 1920 of not to exceed $45,000 from appropriations heretofore made for the 'purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon,' for the operation and maintenance on ordnance reservations at Amatol and Mays Landing, N. J., Nitro, W. Va., Jacksonville, Tenn., Penniman, Va., Sheffield and Muscle Shoals, Ala., and Tullytown, Pa., of schools for children of persons employed thereon, where public schools are not conveniently available for such children, including salaries, supplies, stationery, and industrial work, replacement and repair of books and equipment, and all incidental and necessary expenses in connection therewith."

And on page 11 of the bill, in line 10, strike out "1919" and insert in lieu thereof "1910."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 47, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT.

"RENT.

"For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, fiscal year 1919, $175."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$6,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500," and in line 4 strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$333.34"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and, in line 5, strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and, in line 3, strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$45,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF LABOR.

"For salaries and expenses of the international conference of labor, as follows:

"United States Government executive staff: For two and one-half months, at monthly compensation as follows: assistant to the secretary, $450; first assistant, $300; three executive assistants, at $200 each; two assistants at hotels, at $200 each; private secretary, $200; two stenographers, at $150 each; typist, $125; and two messengers, at $75 each; in all, $6,312.50.

"Conference staff, for two months, at monthly compensation as follows: Two stenographers, at $150 each; two deputy secretaries, at $300 each; four subsecretaries (for commissions), at $200 each; four interpreters, at $200 each; three English-French translators, at $200 each; three French-English translators, at $200 each; six French stenographers, at $83.33 each; six English stenographers, at $150 each; chief messenger, $125; eight messengers, at $75 each; expenses, at not exceeding $10 per diem for each person, $12,000; in all, $23,649.96.

"Chief clerk's office, for two months, at monthly compensation, as follows: Chief clerk, $200; assistant chief clerk, $150; and stenographer, $150; in all, $1,000.

"Expenses: For reporting proceedings, $20,000; printing proceedings, $10,000; paper, $2,500; contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $33,500.

"Total, International conference of labor, $64,462.46: Provided, That all accounting in connection with the conference shall be done by the disbursing officer of the Department of Labor: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for the international conference of labor shall be available for the payment of an allowance for per diem expenses in lieu of subsistence to any person residing in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That this sum shall not be supplemented by expenditures from any other appropriation nor shall any part of this or any other appropriation be used for telegraphing or cabling the proceedings of the said conference."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$1,075"; and the House agree to the same.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, to those who believe in the efficacy of a counterirritant as a remedy for any affliction, I would suggest that those who are suffering from a case of acute and chronic indignation at the bargain that Japan has struck with China should also read, in connection with it, the very strong and equally dictatorial treaty that was made between the United States and China and other nations in 1901.

I use the word "treaty." It was hardly a treaty. It was a protocol signed by the representatives of all of the nations who were engaged in putting down the Boxer rebellion and was never submitted to the Senate for ratification. The Senators, of course, all well remember that the Boxer rebellion grew out of the treaty of 1898 between China and Germany, whereby Germany obtained her Chinese concessions and Chinese leasehold; and the action of military Germany, and the treatment by that great nation of the Chinese people in general, acting upon the Chinese mind, brought about this sentiment of hatred toward all foreigners in China which resulted in the Boxer rebellion.

At the close of the Boxer rebellion the United States agreed with other nations what punishment ought to be inflicted upon China for the offense of attempting to rid herself of all of the foreign elements and foreign influence in China.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me an interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not contend that it was the German aggression alone which led to the Boxer uprising, does he?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it was practically the German aggression. In other words, that was the last straw that broke the camel's back.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was the cause of the acute indignation of the Chinese people against all foreign interference.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator may have refreshed his recollection about it since I have; but my remembrance is that the uprising occurred because the German aggression was followed by aggression upon the part of England and France in taking a part of the Chinese Empire, and then finally the demand of Italy, which never was allowed, but which nevertheless was made. It was the combined action of all of these powers which led China to believe that they had combined for the purpose of dismembering the Chinese Empire. So far as the German aggression was concerned, of course it had its responsibility, because it was the first step taken; but it was not until after these other nations had participated and undertaken to join with Germany in dismembering China that the Boxer uprising took place.

Mr. McCUMBER. Others of these nations, Mr. President, had seized and held Chinese territory long before that, and still there was no uprising. There had been no uprising particularly against the holding of the Shanghai Provinces and control of that section by Great Britain; but I agree with the Senator that it was one after another of these seizures of Chinese territory that so influenced the Chinese mind that they organized their Sinn Fein societies in China to oust the foreigners, and created an intense feeling against them which culminated in the Boxer Rebellion.

Before I proceed to quote from this protocol, I want to call attention to the fact that the United States never objected in the slightest degree to the German aggression and the German treaty. All that the United States did at all was to ask Germany what her purposes were, and whether or not she intended to continue the "open-door" policy. We very abjectly made the inquiry of her, and Germany replied that she would not interfere with that policy of trade with other nations; and then we thanked Germany for being so kind to us and to the Chinese people as to allow us to trade with the Chinese, and that was the extent of any protest upon our part.

Mr. BORAH. The open-door policy had not been established at the time Germany seized Tsingtau.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand, but it had been agreed upon long before that. No one had attempted to close the door.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon, the open-door policy was established by John Hay, and John Hay was not Secretary of State until after the treaty between Germany and China had been closed more than six months.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will find that the only note we sent in reference to the German leasehold interest and claim was a request to know what that was, and also whether it interfered with our trade in China, and Germany replied that it did not, and also replied that she claimed no sovereign rights over the territory.

But, Mr. President, I want to quote the protocol entered into with China and the several other countries that were engaged in putting down the Chinese revolt. This was entered into on the 7th day of September, 1901, and, first, I want to read article 2. I will read two or three of these articles upon the Shantung question, because I think they ought to go into the RECORD:

ART. 2. Imperial edicts of the 13th and 21st days of February, 1901 (Annexes Nos. 4, 5, and 6), inflicted the following punishments on the principal authors of the outrages and crimes committed against the foreign Governments and their nationals:

Tsai-I Prince Tuan and Tsai Lan Duke Fu-Kuo were sentenced to be brought before the autumnal court of assize for execution, and it was agreed that if the Emperor saw fit to grant them their lives they should be exiled to Turkestan and there imprisoned for life, without the possibility of commutation of these punishments.

Tsai Hsün Prince Chung, Ying Nien, president of the court of censors, and Chao Shu-Chiao, president of the board of punishments, were condemned to commit suicide.

In other words, the United States envoy signed a protocol and an agreement whereby it was agreed with all these powers that two of these men should proceed forthwith to commit suicide because they organized societies of Chinese to expel the foreigners; and the others were to be brought before the assizes and there publicly executed.

Yü Hsien, governor of Shanhshi, Chi Hsin, president of the board of rites, and Hsü Cheng-yu, formerly senior vice president of the board of punishments, were condemned to death.

That was not all. They still seemed to believe in the efficacy of degrading the dead, and so the United States became a party to an agreement which reads as follows:

Posthumous degradation was inflicted on Kang Yi, assistant grand secretary, president of the board of works; Hsü Tung, grand secretary; and Li Ping-heng, formerly governor general of Szu-ch'uan.

An imperial edict of February 13, 1901 (Annex No. 7), rehabilitated the memories of Hsü Yung-yi, president of the board of war; Li Shuon, president of the board of works; Hsü Ching-cheng, senior vice president of the board of works; Lien Yuan, vice chancellor of the grand council; and Yuan Chang, vice president of the court of sacrifices, who had been put to death for having protested against the outrageous breaches of international law of last year.

Prince Chuang committed suicide the 21st day of February, 1901, Ying Nien and Chao Shu-chiao the 24th, Yü Hsien was executed the 22d, Chi Hsin and Hsü Cheng-yu on the 26th. Tung Fu-hsiang, general in Kan-su, has been deprived of his office by imperial edict of the 13th of February, 1901, pending the determination of the final punishment to be inflicted on him.

Imperial edicts dated the 29th of April and 19th of August, 1901, have inflicted various punishments on the provincial officials convicted of crimes and outrages of last summer.

This article, Mr. President, deals with the punishments that were inflicted upon those who, of course, had committed, according to the view of the foreign nations, crimes against the western nations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator thinks the punishments were too severe?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the matter of compelling people to commit suicide is a little novel, at least to western ideas.

Mr. BORAH. I understand. I had some sympathy with the Boxer uprising. I think they had a perfect right to throw those people out of their country, and I am still in favor of keeping those people out of their country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we agree upon two things; first, that they had no business to go in there against the wishes and desires of the Chinese people; and, secondly, that if we can not get them out, we will prevent them from getting in any farther. How we are to accomplish that result is a matter on which, perhaps, the Senator and myself may differ; but I do not think we differ at all as to what ought to be done.

Mr. BORAH. No; I think not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now I come, Mr. President, to article 5, and I want Senators to think of it a moment:

ART. V. China has agreed to prohibit the importation into its territory of arms and ammunition, as well as of materials exclusively used for the manufacture of arms and ammunition.

An imperial edict has been issued on the 25th of August, 1901 (Annex No. 11), forbidding said importation for a term of two years. New edicts may be issued subsequently extending this by other successive terms of two years in case of necessity recognized by the powers.

In other words, the powers determined not only that they would execute those who were instrumental in this uprising against foreign aggression in China, but to make it certain that Germany and every other country that had a foothold in China should not be interfered with in the future, they proceeded to prevent the importation of any arms or ammunition into China which would enable her people to make a war for the independence of that country; and this country was a party to that agreement.

Again:

ART. VI. By an imperial edict dated the 29th day of May, 1901 (Annex No. 12), His Majesty the Emperor of China agreed to pay the powers an indemnity of 450,000,000 Haikwan taels. This sum represents the total amount of the indemnities for States, companies, or societies, private individuals, and Chinese referred to in article 6 of the note of December 22, 1900.

I believe that a tael amounts to somewhere about 76 cents. But it was an enormous sum to be levied against that poor, decrepit country, that has made the only fight she knew how to make to defend herself, without having armies and without having munition plants.

Here is another beautiful article:

ART. VII. The Chinese Government has agreed that the quarter occupied by the legations shall be considered as one specially reserved for their use and placed under their exclusive control, in which Chinese shall not have the right to reside, and which may be made defensible.

We are now going into spasms, Mr. President, because Japan, in her treaty with China, makes the demand that she shall be given a concession where Japanese may settle and carry on their business. We forget that the United States entered into an agreement with all of these other powers whereby they compelled China to grant concessions of certain quarters where no Chinaman could live in that section of China, and which would be entirely under the control of foreign countries.

Mr. BORAH. The United States did not claim any concessions for herself.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; she claimed the same concession. I must say here that it related to those sections in which the diplomats of the several countries were to reside, and the section where the United States diplomats resided, wherever it was, would be under the control of the United States, and no Chinaman could live there if we saw fit to enforce this provision.

Mr. BORAH. We undertook to protect our embassy, but we did not ask for such concessions as Germany and Great Britain and France were attempting to secure. We did not seek any concessions of that kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I stated that this related to those sections that were occupied by the several embassies, and may have been thought necessary in order to protect the embassies. But I am sure that if any foreign country—Great Britain, for instance—were to claim that inasmuch as she had an embassy in Washington she should control Washington, and that no American should live in Washington, there would be some complaint that would be made by this country; or if she were given a portion of Washington to be occupied by her embassy, she should control whatever section she thought it was necessary to include for diplomatic purposes.

Mr. BORAH. I recall that when we had the prohibition bill up there was an attempt to exclude the British Embassy from the operation of the prohibition law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have an idea that inasmuch as the embassies are practically considered as under the control of the foreign countries, they can bring the wines of France to the French Embassy and can possibly bring the ales of Great Britain to the British Embassy. But that is hardly applicable to this protocol.

That is not all. It reads further:

The Chinese Government has consented to raze the forts of Taku and those which might impede free communication between Peking and the sea; steps have been taken for carrying this out.

Peking being some distance from the sea, it was necessary that these foreign powers, in order that they might cope with any kind of Chinese uprising, should have the channel of the river deepened and forts should be razed so that we could reach the interior of China and make war upon China. There is no offense in that. That was by the United States of America. But if Japan suggests the idea that she might have a controlling influence or an equal influence with China, if she furnishes the money to build a railway in China, we immediately say that there is some purpose on the part of China to hold and control the Chinese Government, which becomes criminal, but if we do the same thing with all the powers joining us, it is not even a proper subject for discussion.

Now I want to read article 9:

The Chinese Government has conceded the right to the powers in the protocol annexed to the letter of the 16th of January, 1901, to occupy certain points, to be determined by agreement between them, for the maintenance of open communication between the capital and the sea.

That is a concession, Mr. President, exactly the same as Japan was asking of China in her treaty.

The points occupied by the powers are, I believe, 10 in number.

They are not satisfied with 1, but they name some 10 different points that will be occupied by them.

Now we come to article 10:

ART. 10. The Chinese Government has agreed to post and to have published during two years in all district cities the following imperial edicts:

(a) Edict of the 1st of February (annex number 15), prohibiting forever, under pain of death, membership in any antiforeign society.

How does that sit upon the stomach of the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from California? Let me read it again——

Mr. BORAH. I will state to the Senator, before he reads it, that I was not here when that thing happened, and I am not one of those who believe that four wrongs make a right. I think that the action of Great Britain and France and Germany with reference to China was based upon immoral principles, and I do not think the action of Germany rests alone upon immoral principles.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nor do I.

Mr. BORAH. Although she includes with her Great Britain and France.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have included them all.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator includes them all. The only place where the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Idaho differ is as to whether or not we shall stop that program. I do not hesitate to say that Japan, upon the precedents of the past, has a perfect right to make her demand. She is not asking anything except what Great Britain asked for and what France asked for. I concede that proposition, but I do not want myself to be a party to a program to continue that kind of a wrong.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, Mr. President, I want myself to be a party to a program that will stop it.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. How we are to stop it is the only question, I think, on which the Senator and I disagree. But what I wanted to point out to the Senator was that we entered into an agreement whereby we made it mighty hard for the Sinn Feiner to exist in China, because we provided that if he organized a society in China for the purpose of protecting the Chinese nationality he was forthwith to be executed.

Mr. BORAH. If there was anything in the agreement that was against the Sinn Feiners, I would be against the agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am certain the Senator would be; and I will ask him if he does not think that this really was against them?

Edict of the 1st of February, * * * prohibiting forever, under pain of death, membership in any antiforeign society.

In other words, if there is a society formed in China for the purpose of creating a solidarity of sentiment on the part of the Chinese people against the aggressions of Germany or Great Britain or Japan or any other country, the United States has compelled the Chinese people to proceed forthwith to execute every man engaged in creating that sentiment, and the United States was a party to that agreement. The United States came in and upheld the arm of Germany by entering into an agreement that no Chinaman could live who would dare raise his voice against this aggression; and now, 20 years afterwards, we find that it is a heinous crime for any other country even to suggest that it should have a concession where its own nationals might live, and have an agreement that Germany had, that if Japanese people furnished the money to build a certain railway they, together with China, should join in the operation of that railway.

Mr. BORAH. All these things of which the Senator is speaking——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not holding the Senator responsible for the protocol. I want the Senator to understand that. I do not mean that he should come to his own defense in any way on it. I am certain he is earnestly opposed to it, as I am.

Mr. BORAH. But permit me to say that the things which the Senator is now speaking of were the things which led John Hay to adopt the policy which was intended to stop all these things and which it was believed would do so. At the time that John Hay introduced his policy with reference to China the dismemberment of China was proceeding at a rapid pace. Would the Senator object to my reading a statement from the Life of John Hay, by William Roscoe Thayer, with reference to the matter he is discussing?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it long or short?

Mr. BORAH. It is only a paragraph.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator may read it. I think it will conform to both our views.

Mr. BORAH. I think it does. The Senator is pointing out something here which I do not defend; but what I do say is that John Hay stopped that program, and in so far as it was stopped the honor is due to the United States. The paragraph which I read is as follows:

> The Boxer upheaval interrupted and made more difficult Hay's endeavor to preserve the Chinese Empire. After the Japanese defeated the Chinese in 1894 China lay like a stranded whale apparently dead or dying, and the chief powers of Europe came, like fishermen after blubber, and took here a Province and there a harbor, and were callous to the fact that their victim was not dead. They not only seized territory but forced from the Chinese concessions for mines, railways, commercial privileges, and spheres of influence. From the time that Hay became Secretary he strove to keep intact the political integrity of China and to persuade all the powers to maintain there the policy of the "open door."

So Hay saw the wrong and the evil which the Senator is portraying and, in so far as was possible for him to do so, he put a check upon the program. What I want to do is to follow up that program as nearly as I can to protect the integrity of China.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I say there is no disagreement at all between the Senator and myself upon what we ought to do. I want to stop the dismemberment of China. The German concessions did not stop the dismemberment. We did not protest against that seizure. All on earth that we did was to ask Germany whether she would allow us to trade in that territory, and Germany very magnanimously said yes, and we very modestly said thank you, and that was the end of the correspondence, and that is all the protest there was against it.

That is not all. When Germany got her control Great Britain saw that she would have to look out for her interests a little more, and so she seized another section of the country, and we did not make any protest against that. Neither John Hay nor anyone else opposed it.

There was no protest on the part of the American people against any of these seizures, but on the contrary, years after those seizures, and in 1901, we entered into an agreement with the other nations whereby we compelled China, of her own volition, to inflict a penalty of death upon any one of her citizens who would have the audacity to attempt to create a public sentiment against foreigners for the purpose of protecting China. I say, after having done that, that we are not in a very good position to cry "thief" at Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator believe there is a place for repentance?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President, I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is here and the rest of us are here now, and we disagree with that program of the past. Why not inaugurate a new program and put our seal of disapproval upon the further dismemberment of China?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. When he talks about repentance, does he propose to make restitution and require France and Russia and Great Britain to restore to China what they took from her with our consent?

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not enter upon that task, but I would do this: I would not permit the United States to put itself in a position where it will guarantee the continuance of those holdings in China, which we are doing under the league of nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say I must disagree with that proposition that we are doing this under the league of nations. On the contrary, I hold that we are doing just exactly the opposite of that. On the contrary, I hold that Japan has an agreement with China whereby she agrees to return whatever Germany had in Shantung, at least, subject to the conditions that I have enumerated heretofore. The Senator would not have the United States go to war for the purpose of wresting Chinese territory from Great Britain or from France or from Japan.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Idaho encourages China to hold out and refuse to carry out her alleged treaty with Japan, made in 1915, by which Japan is obligated—that is, by the note accompanying it—to return the leased territory, then he might leave China worse off than she is now. He might deprive her of the opportunity of securing a return of the leased territory and prompt Japan to rely upon what she regards as her claim of conquest; and having prompted China to violate her treaty with Japan and thus encourage Japan to rely upon her conquest, he might find China compelled to go to war with Japan, and then leave the United States in the attitude of having encouraged the war and of being unwilling to assist China.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is in error as to the position which the Senator from Idaho occupies. I am not seeking to have China disregard her treaty of 1915——

Mr. ROBINSON. But the——

Mr. BORAH. Just wait a minute. I am opposed to the United States underwriting that treaty and maintaining it and upholding it. I think that treaty was absolutely void on its face; but if China wants to perform the treaty, so far as I am concerned as a citizen of the United States I am not going to object to her doing it. But what I do object to is the United States guaranteeing, confirming, and underwriting that treaty, and that is what we are doing in this league of nations.

Mr. ROBINSON. I disagree with the Senator from Idaho. That is exactly what we are not doing.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this discussion has nothing to do with the pending amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has not; that is true.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that unless the discussion is confined to the pending amendment, I shall object to his yielding for speeches by others.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. I did not know but the Senator was going to change the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. As I have got to go, I do not object to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had no objection to the Senator from North Dakota yielding to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who has just availed himself of the same privilege of which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and I have availed ourselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I quoted the protocol not for the purpose of justifying anything in the Japanese-Chinese treaty, but as throwing some light upon the attitude of the United States, and the very changed attitude at the present time, if we are to assume the attitude advocated by those in favor of this amendment is to be taken as the present purpose of the United States, I am not going again into the arguments which have been made relative to Shantung further than to restate in a single sentence the view that I have with reference to the effect of bringing both China and Japan into the league.

The Senator says that if we adopt this treaty we have got to underwrite whatever rights Japan has secured. Mr. President, we underwrite nothing. Japan secures no territory, she secures no sovereignty, because the German treaty itself declared that Germany renounced any claim of sovereignty over this territory, and whatever the Japanese received they received from Germany. Therefore, inasmuch as article 10 could not, even if adopted in its present form, cover anything but territorial rights, instead of underwriting Japan, the effect of article 10 would be to underwrite the claim of China, because China can present her claim to the council or league of nations that Japan, contrary to her agreement, is attempting to hold Chinese territory. Then the efficacy of the league of nations will be put to the test, and the test will be whether or not the league of nations will protect Chinese territory. Mr. President, they will have to protect it if they do not dishonor themselves, and each and every one of them, under the terms of the league of nations.

So in determining the best method by which we shall secure the result which the Senator from Idaho, as well as myself, wishes to secure, we are forced to the conclusion that the only way absolutely to protect Chinese territory from future aggression is to bring Japan and all countries which are inclined to seize territory into a league where all of them not only agree that they will cease their predatory habits, but, in addition, that they will protect the territorial interests of any country against whom any other nation attempts to make a war of aggression.

As suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, Japan can stand upon one of two rights—either upon her treaty with China or upon her right of conquest. If we take her into the league, if we bind her by the terms of the league, then we bind her to return to China whatever she seized from Germany. If we do not bind her by the league, if we throw her out of the league, then she holds by virtue of her right of conquest, and that right we will never attempt to gainsay.

So I repeat, Mr. President, that it might be a good thing for those who are so affected by what Japan has done in her treaty with China to refer back to article 10 of the protocol to which I have referred and there read what the United States has done not in protection of China but in protecting every country that has attempted to dismember China, including the German Shantung leasehold interests.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if we could vote right now on the pending amendment, I should not take the floor; but if we are to go on everlastingly in the discussion of propositions that have been disposed of, I shall take a little time to speak on another subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Iowa ask unanimous consent that we shall vote on the amendment, say before 1.30 o'clock?

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to ask unanimous consent for a vote; I am only going to take about 10 minutes; but if we can vote upon the pending amendment now, I shall not take a minute.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to make the request?

Mr. KENYON. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may agree to proceed to a vote on the two pending amendments to-day not later than 1.30 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gronna	McCormick	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	McCumber	Simmons
Borah	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Harris	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Harrison	McNary	Spencer
Chamberlain	Henderson	Moses	Sterling
Colt	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, Calif.	New	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Dial	Kellogg	Overman	Trammell
Edge	Keyes	Penrose	Wadsworth
Fall	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
France	Kirby	Poindexter	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Pomerene	Watson
Gay	Lenroot	Robinson	Williams
Gerry	Lodge	Sheppard

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I see no occasion for fixing an hour. I see no reason why we should not vote at once, so far as I am aware.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, insert the following proviso at the end of article 3:

(1): Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I understand, however, that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. So I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. MARTIN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness. He is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is absent on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). As announced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], I have a general pair with his colleague. On the statement of the Senator from South Carolina I am at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is ill and unable to be present and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], who is detained on official business. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote "yea."

I wish also to announce the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. If the Senator from Maine were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (after having voted in the affirmative). Owing to illness in my home, I found it necessary last week to make a pair on this question in case of my unavoidable absence when the vote should be reached. I find that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], who was to pair with me in case of my absence, has been called to his home, and requested me to pair with him, as he would have done for me had I been necessarily absent. Therefore I announce that on this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate by illness in their families. If present, these Senators would vote "nay." The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business. If present, these Senators would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—38.

Ball	Gore	McCormick	Sherman
Borah	Gronna	McLean	Shields
Brandegee	Harding	Moses	Smoot
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	New	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sutherland

NOT VOTING—18.

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Beckham	Kendrick	Reed	Watson
Calder	Martin	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Elkins	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Fernald	Phelan	Stanley

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia subsequently said: Mr. President, just before 12 o'clock I went down to Keith's Theater to attend the Roosevelt memorial service. The service was not alone to pay tribute to a great American but also had in view raising funds to purchase in Georgia the home in which President Roosevelt's mother was born and the dedication of that home to use as a school for mountain boys. I was away about half an hour and had no idea a vote would take place at this time. Had I been present, I should have voted against the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I was assured that there would be no vote during this hour. So I went to the Interior Department with some gentlemen from Arizona who desired to be introduced there. To my surprise I was informed upon reaching the department that, notwithstanding the assurance that came to me that there would be no vote, a vote was taken on the Johnson amendment. I wish to state that if I could have been present I would have voted "nay." I ask unanimous consent to be recorded as voting "nay."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not like to object to a request of that kind from a Senator, but if the request is granted the same courtesy should be accorded to any Senator who telegraphs here under similar circumstances. The Senator from Arizona has made his statement and made his record.

Mr. ASHURST. I withdraw the request.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it seems that during my absence on official business, in common with several of my colleagues, the unexpected happened. I have no one to blame but myself, however, but I plead that I have been diligently waiting for this event. However, I desire to have it recorded, as long as the tally sheet can not be changed, that if present I would have voted "nay" upon the Johnson amendment. I desire also to state that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the purpose which the Johnson amendment sought to attain, but that I did not believe it would accomplish the very worthy purpose which was in the mind of my colleague. I think that a reservation, without disrupting the league, can very properly be devised by which substantially the same purpose can be attained, and therefore I will support such a reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have had, for many years, a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but I thought it was understood between us that on questions relating to the treaty the pair was off, and therefore I voted. If there should be the slightest sort of misunderstanding about it, or if the Senator thought the pair was still holding, I can only say that, if I had the power, I should withdraw my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me one moment, there is one more committee amendment to be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one more committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I be permitted to offer this amendment and have it read?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I only wanted to conclude the consideration of the committee amendments in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then, subsequently, with the disposition of the other committee amendments——

Mr. LODGE. Then it will be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California desire his amendment to go in at the same place where this amendment was just rejected?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not so state on the amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

When any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have representatives in the council or assembly or any organization of labor or labor conference under the league numerically equal to the aggregate number of representatives of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league or organization of labor or labor conference under the league, and such representatives of the United States shall have the same powers and rights as the representatives of said member and its self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, and upon all matters whatsoever the United States shall have votes in the council and assembly and any organization of labor or labor conference under the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote cast or registered by any such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire. The intent and purpose of this amendment is to give to the United States representation upon council or assembly and in any labor organization or labor conference under the league, a voting power in every respect and upon all questions equal to the aggregate representation and voting power of any member of the league and such member's self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire, and this amendment shall be literally applied and construed to effectuate fully said intent.

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate proceed to consider amendment No. 2, the last of the committee amendments, after which this amendment will, of course, be at once in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gronna	McCumber	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Harding	McLean	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Myers	Smoot
Colt	Hitchcock	Nelson	Spencer
Culberson	Johnson, Calif.	New	Sterling
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson

Gerry	Lodge	Robinson	Watson
Gore	McCormick	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the second committee amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 8, on page 31, after line 8, to insert:

(2) Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to take no time on this amendment. This is the amendment which provides that where Great Britain or one of her colonies or parts of empire is a disputant the other self-governing dominions, parts of empire, or colonies, or Great Britain herself, shall be excluded, so that she shall not herself have five votes when she is engaged in a dispute. On that question I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it ought to be stated, in reference to this amendment, that there is no question but what we are in accord with the principle. It agrees entirely with proposed reservations, and I do not think there will be a vote against its equivalent as a reservation. The only question is whether that declaration should be put in as an amendment or as a reservation. I shall vote against it as an amendment, because I am certain that with probably not a dissenting vote something very similar will go in as a reservation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the amendment, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee, on page 31, after line 8, insert: "Provided further, That when imperial and federal governments and their self-governing dominions, colonies, or states are members of the league, as originally organized or hereafter admitted, the empire or federal government and the dominions, colonies, or states shall, collectively, have only one membership, one delegate, and one vote in the council and only three delegates and one vote in the assembly."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words upon this amendment.

The amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and just voted upon, provided that the United States should have six votes in the assembly, so as to equalize it with the six votes which the British Empire and its five self-governing dominions and colonies are allowed in that body. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has announced that he would offer a reservation to take the place of the Johnson amendment providing that in disputes between the British Empire or any of its dominions and colonies and the United States the empire and its dependencies should have but one vote, thus equalizing the voting power of the British Empire and the United States where the United States is interested.

The amendment I offer applies to all nations and places them upon the equality to which they under well-recognized principles of international law are entitled.

The objection to the Johnson amendment is that it gives the United States the same undue representation and power allowed the British Government as against all other nations, and the Lenroot reservation merely corrects the inequality between the British Empire and the United States in the decision of disputes between them and does not meet the objection that the British Empire is given precedence over the United States and is an affront to the dignity of the national honor, and, further, that it does not correct the preponderance in influence and power that the British Empire will have in disputes between any two other nations of the world over that of the United States.

and which would, of course, induce all other nations to favor the British Empire in disputes in order to get a return of support upon any question that might come up between them and the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] covers a wider question, as I understand it, than the amendment on which we were about to vote. The amendment upon which we were about to vote covers the proposition where there is a dispute directly between the British Empire and the United States. As I understand the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee, it goes further and reduces the vote of the British Empire under all circumstances and in all instances to the same vote as the United States; that is, it reduces it to one. I should like very much to vote for both of them. I do not desire to suggest to the Senator what he shall do with his proposition, but I should be glad if he would offer it not as a substitute but as an amendment to the pending amendment or else withhold it until we dispose of the pending amendment and give us an opportunity to vote on it separately.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is slightly in error in his construction of the application of this amendment. It is an amendment offered by me in committee and appearing with the other committee amendments and is designed to equalize the voting strength among disputants in all cases, whether the dispute should be between the British Empire and the United States or between the British Empire and any other disputant. In any such case the British Empire would be deprived of the right to enjoy the votes of its five colonies, dependencies, or parts of empire, in the same way that a single member of the league would be deprived of its single vote.

I have no especial hope, in view of the vote just taken, that the amendment will be agreed to. The tender susceptibilities of Great Britain, of course, must be preserved upon the floor of the Senate, but I wish to point out before the vote is taken that even those Senators who are willing that Great Britain should have six votes in the assembly to the one vote of the United States might find in my amendment an opportunity to equalize the chances between the United States and the British Empire in case of dispute between us.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator, if the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] should be adopted, would not that make absolutely unnecessary the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MOSES. I think the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee goes further than my amendment. I think that it covers substantially the matter contained in my amendment, together with the matter covered by the amendment just disposed of, and I think a much more satisfactory method of dealing with the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee would be to make it an amendment to the amendment. Then we would be certain that all phases of the subject had been covered. However, every phase of the subject has been covered in the admirably drawn amendment which the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has presented and which will presently come before us for discussion. So, I suppose all the questions, my amendment, that of the Senator from Tennessee, and that of the Senator from California can be discussed simultaneously.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I make this suggestion to the Senator? As I understand the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee, it reduces the vote of the British Empire to one; in other words, it puts it upon an equality with every other member of the league.

Mr. MOSES. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If it were adopted, then this other situation could not possibly arise.

Mr. MOSES. Certainly; and I think that covers the matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So, if we adopt the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee, it covers the whole proposition.

Mr. MOSES. It could be readily disposed of, I assume, if the Senator in charge of the treaty were to accept the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee as a substitute for the amendment offered by the committee. Unhappily, I am not in that position and can not make the acceptance; but I would much prefer to have a vote on it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the substitute which I offer covers the whole situation, and if it is adopted there will be no cases to which the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire can apply, and therefore its provisions will be wholly unnecessary. That amendment does not meet the whole case like the one which I have submitted, which goes to the very root of the proposed inequality of representation of the several nations in the council and assembly of the league.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not feel warranted in accepting the amendment without some action by the committee, which I have not had, and without an opportunity to consult them. I have not had that opportunity. Personally, I should prefer the method proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] of voting on them separately, but I am perfectly willing to vote upon them in any form.

Mr. MOSES. It is perfectly evident, in view of the vote already taken, that we shall vote on them separately. Undoubtedly we shall vote upon the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee as a substitute for the amendment presented by the committee, and we shall then have an opportunity to vote upon the committee amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I shall vote against the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and I shall, of course, vote against the committee amendment now before the Senate. The substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee practically disqualifies, and bars from useful membership in the league, the great Dominion of Canada to the north of us. It also bars Australia, another great self-governing dominion, made a member of the league and a member of the assembly, as many other lesser countries are. It bars the Union of South Africa. It bars every self-governing dominion of the British Empire. It is a radical, drastic, and destructive amendment of the league of nations, and if it should be adopted, either as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, or as an independent amendment, it would practically destroy the treaty.

Mr. President, I am unable to understand why it is that Senators view the membership of these great self-governing dominions of the British Empire with so much misgiving and so much opposition. Senators have stood here upon the floor and declared that Great Britain had six votes. They have stood here and declared that the British Empire had six votes. It is not possible that intelligent people should believe either statement. Great Britain is not a member of the league. The British Empire is specifically given one vote for the council and one vote for the assembly. To say that the British Empire has six votes is to say that the fight which Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa have made for independent recognition and independent representation in the assembly is a farce. Each has secured a vote for itself because it is not willing to be represented by the Empire.

We all know that these great self-governing dominions of the British Empire have been slowly but steadily progressing toward independence. Everyone knows that these great self-governing dominions have sometimes chafed at the idea of not being independently represented in international affairs. I can not doubt that people also know that when votes were given to these self-governing dominions, it was not at the request of London, it was not at the desire of the Imperial British Government, but it was at the insistence of Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, and Australia. It was a part of their settled purpose to increase still more their independent position in the world. It is a part of the policy which they have pursued for many years toward having complete independence. It was due to the fact that they were not willing to be represented by the Imperial Government that they refused to have the Imperial Government speak for them and bind them in the assembly. Now, why should the United States view such an attitude on their part with apprehension?

Mr. President, here is Canada to the north of us, a great democracy, a sister nation. Canada does more business with us than with any nation in the world, many times over. Canada's population, virtually already American, comes into the United States, and constitutes a large percentage of the population of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts. Are we jealous of Canada, a great Anglo-Saxon nation, having the same traditions and aspirations that we have and having progressed so far toward independent government? Can not we trust them to be members of the assembly and vote for the representation of their interests and their rights?

Mr. President, we all know that there are radical differences between the Imperial British Government and the Government of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. We all know that Canada will not admit to her borders the immigration of British citizens natives of India. We know that South Africa has enacted rigid legislation against immigrants from India, although citizens of the British Empire; has refused to permit those British citizens to come into the Union of South Africa to carry on business except on license from the Government of South Africa. Even within the last few years the Union of South Africa has enforced still more rigidly legislation and regulation against the people of India, British citizens, coming into the South African Union.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We know that Canada will not permit, as I say, immigration either from India or from Japan or from China, and that in that respect Canada sympathizes much more closely with the United States than with the imperial Government of Great Britain.

Mr. President, I say that I can not see why there should be any honest sentiment in America against having Canada cast a vote in the assembly of the league of nations. I am not saying that it would not be proper to exclude Canada and the other dominions of the British Empire from a vote in case an interest exists. I am not saying that it might not be proper, and I believe in fact it is the correct interpretation of the league of nations that neither Canada nor the dominions nor any part of the British Empire should vote in any case in which the empire is interested as a whole, but I do say, Mr. President, that it is entirely out of harmony with American institutions that we in the United States should be jealous of Canada or Australia, or even of the Union of South Africa or of New Zealand.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are a part of the great Anglo-Saxon race like ourselves, and if France does not object and Italy does not object and Japan does not object, and the neutral nations of Europe that are to become members of the league do not object, why in heaven's name should we, closely related to them in brotherhood, sympathy, and tradition, as well as in interest and aspiration, object to these great self-governing dominions being represented in the league of nations?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] closed his splendid panegyric upon the people of Canada, whom I think I know better than he does, inasmuch as no less than 28 per cent of the population of my State are of Canadian origin and among the best citizens of New England—I regret that he closed his panegyric upon that portion of the population of the British Empire which rightfully, I will say, have representation in the league of nations, without pausing to pass an equal encomium upon the subject people of the Indian empire, who are not citizens, as he has stated, but a subject race, and who equally have a vote in the assembly of the league of nations with Canada, a situation to which I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I, too, am surprised at the Senator from Nebraska. The floor of the Senate is the only place in the civilized world where such an interpretation as that contended for by the Senator from Nebraska prevails. It does not prevail in Canada; it does not prevail in New Zealand; neither does it prevail in Australia and South Africa. What they may think of it in India I do not know; but India is a member of the league, although, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has stated, it is a subject race. There is no more self-government in most of the districts of India than there is in Japan. The greater part of the inhabitants of the British East Indies are a subject race, even those of ancient lineage, the Brahmins, and the priests of the primeval temples. They were a powerful race of people and were civilized before Christ came on earth, even long before the Anglo-Saxon was known in human history. Their fathers and their gods are not as ours, but they are more ancient than any other nation in the world save the Chinese. When the seers and prophets of ancient Irsael made known the law to their people India was civilized and was known in written history; yet, Mr. President, it is a subject race. There is not an educated Hindu of the Brahmin class who ever traveled, lectured, or conversed with an American citizen in the United States who did not regard himself as a subject, and one without a voice in the regulation of his own local affairs, and a subject of the Kingdom of Great Britain.

When it comes to Canada, Mr. President, it is peculiarly unfortunate that Sir Robert Borden in a recent article takes issue with the Senators who claim that there is no numerical excess in the vote of the British Empire over that of the United States. Sir Robert Borden, in an article of October 7, 1919—not yet three weeks ago—takes violent issue with the Senator from Nebraska. It would not be contended that Sir Robert Borden does not represent Canada; it would not be insisted by the most zealous advocate of the league in its present form that he does not understand the status of the Dominion of Canada or its relation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain. I do not hope to convert any Senator on the minority side of the Chamber, least of all the Senator from Nebraska; but in order that it may remain as a part of the permanent record of this discussion, let me read some of the opinions expressed by Sir Robert Borden.

First, in the second paragraph of an article published in the New York Sun of the date I have given, he delivers this opinion on the status of the Dominion of Canada:

> Early in December preliminary conversations on the making of peace took place in London between representatives of the British Empire, of France, and of Italy, and the proposal which I had already put forward was accepted in principle. The preliminary peace conference began at Paris on January 12, 1919, and the question of procedure, including that of representation, was immediately taken up by the representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, afterwards commonly known as the Council of Ten.
> At first strong objection was made to the proposed representation of the British dominions. Subsequently there was a full discussion in the British Empire delegation at which a firm protest was made against any recession from the proposal adopted in London. In the end that proposal was accepted.

I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska—although he is absent now from his seat—answer Sir Robert Borden, the premier of the Dominion of Canada. This matter is not new. In several debates that have occurred, especially those participated in by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and in matter incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some days ago, by my colleague [Mr. MCCORMICK], the position referred to has been fully outlined. It has not been adverted to by the Senator from Nebraska or by any of those who insist that the laws of mathematics from time immemorial have been repealed. It has not been discussed by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Their arguments are equal to some other mathematical efforts in politics. We were once regaled with a long discussion of 16 to 1, and we now have it in the form of 6 to 1. Since the Arabic system of notation was invented every time anybody undertakes to prove that the integer or unit, which is simply a multiplication when larger numbers are involved, is equal to any larger number of units combined, profound philosophical discussion is required. The casuists of the Middle Ages have been rivaled in this Chamber by those who have sought to draw fine distinctions between the British Empire, the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and her colonial possessions; but, after all, their contentions, when reduced to the final analysis, regardless of the interpretation of authorities in Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, are all summed up in the assertion that 6 must be equal only to 1 in the government ordained by the league of nations. But no answer has been made to the statement of Sir Robert Borden.

It is argued, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and defeated a few moments ago in its original form would not accomplish the desired purpose. The motive, however, is there. I shall not argue that question, because that amendment has been disposed of. It is possible that the idea embodied in the reservation offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will reach the desired end or that the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] will reach it. What I wish particularly to refer to is that neither the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from North Dakota, nor any other Senator has answered the statements made by those in authority in the Dominion of Canada or any of the other colonial possessions of Great Britain. Neither have eminent English and French authorities been answered.

It is assumed, I presume, that the Senators who adopt this view know more about the relations of the colonial possessions of Great Britain to the parent country than the parent country and those possessions themselves know. I will proceed with my reading from that article, or such portions of it as are material to this question. The council of 10 includes the British Empire, her five colonies that are signatory nations to the league, and four other nations. They constituted the council of 10 in the peace conference, and when the council of 10 is referred to in this article it should be so interpreted:

> The adoption of the panel system gave the dominions a peculiarly effective position. At plenary sessions there were sometimes three Canadian plenipotentiary delegates, two as representatives of Canada and one as representative of the Empire. Moreover, throughout the proceedings of the conference the Dominion delegates, as members of the British Empire delegation, were thoroughly in touch with all the proceedings of the conference and had access to all the papers recording its proceedings.

Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senate that while the authorities of Canada have access to the papers recording the proceedings before the peace conference the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and no Member of the Senate have access to them. The contemporary documents and opinions of delegates to the peace conference that are material to the interpretation of the league covenant are not open to the Senate nor to the Foreign Relations Committee. In the history of our own country, and especially its constitutional history, all that was said at the Philadelphia Convention, the addresses made by those who favored the Federal plan as well as by those who favored the league plan in the adoption of our present form of government, were preserved—the Madison Papers, all of the addresses of Hamilton, the debates before the several conventions or State legislatures of the thirteen original States are all preserved. Elliott's Debates contain at length the record of the proceedings, not only of the Federal convention but of the conventions or legislatures of the several States called on to ratify or reject the Constitution. The Supreme Court opinions are full of citations from these records of the early time in connection with the interpretation of paragraphs, of phrases, of articles, and of the preamble and purpose of the Constitution. The record of the remarks of the delegates to the convention have for more than 130 years been a part of the imperishable heritage of this country in the construction of constitutional provisions. Why is it that in this crisis of our country we are denied access to the archives giving the information as to the different sections of the league covenant and furnishing the reasons why they were adopted? These records, which in this crisis of our country would be invaluable in the interpretation of these articles, are not forthcoming. When the Committee on Foreign Relations sought some of the papers, such as the different drafts of the league of nations that were offered by the representatives of various countries, they could not be had. When they asked for the records of the discussions had, for the use of the Foreign Relations Committee—not necessarily for publication, if it should be deemed incompatible with the public interest—those records were not produced. The reply was made that unless by consent of the other 23 nations represented at the peace conference those records could not be given to the Foreign Relations Committee, or made accessible to the Senate, even if in executive session. So we are without them; but I apprehend from the reading of this paragraph in Sir Robert Borden's article, referred to, that all those records are known to him and to the representatives of the British Empire or her several colonial possessions.

> At plenary sessions there were sometimes three Canadian plenipotentiary delegates, two as representatives of Canada and one as representative of the empire.

That refers particularly to the representation of Canada and the other colonial possessions.

> Moreover, throughout the proceedings of the conference the Dominion delegates, as members of the British Empire delegation, were thoroughly in touch with all the proceedings of the conference and had access to all the papers recording its proceedings.

Why this mystery and silence? Why is it that that information is denied to the Senate or to the Foreign Relations Committee? Why have we not had access to all the records and the debates that would enlighten us upon the meaning of these several articles? Great Britain, both her representatives of the United Kingdom and the representatives of her five colonial possessions—I will make this statement, and I think I am justified in making it in view of some other evidence I have, which I do not care to quote at present—all of them have been thoroughly conversant with every step of the discussion, and every means afforded to enlighten themselves on why these articles were framed as they are or what led to the adoption of the league as a whole. We are denied the customary documents that go along with great constitutional creations. We are denied here all that might enlighten us and put us on an equality of knowledge with the Dominion of Canada or with Australia.

There is a purpose in this. There is hidden away in these records such indubitable evidence that Great Britain, when this league is in working order, will have five votes in her colonial possessions and one of her own; that it could not be even debated on the opposite side of this Chamber; it could not even be contended by the most subtle casuist, in all the forensic discussion that might be invented, that there was any question about what Great Britain understood in the practical operation of the league. I believe that is why those records are denied us.

Continuing:

> This enabled them to watch and check those proceedings effectively in the interest of their respective dominions.

He is speaking now of the whole five of the colonial possessions; and he says it enabled them effectively, in the interest of their respective dominions, to watch and check any proceedings to change the program. I will further show in a minute that that program was to give each of these colonial possessions the status of an integral nation and to stand in the league with one vote representing their sovereignty.

> Dominion ministers were nominated to and acted for the British Empire on the principal allied commissions appointed by the conference from time to time to consider and report upon special aspects of the conditions of peace.
> On several occasions I was charged with the duty of attending as one of the British Empire representatives on the council of five. Mr. Lloyd-George called upon me to put forward before the council of four the British Empire case in respect of the clauses on economic questions, on the international control of ports, waterways, and railways, and on submarine cables. During the last month of my stay in Paris I acted regularly as chairman of the British Empire delegations in the absence of the prime minister of the United Kingdom, whose duties as a member of the council of four constantly prevented his attendance.
> It is desirable to note an important development in constitutional practice respecting the signature of the various treaties concluded at the conference. Hitherto it has been the practice to insert an article or reservation providing for the adhesion of the dominions. In view of the new position that had been secured, and of the part played by dominion representatives at the peace table, we thought this method inappropriate and undesirable in connection with the peace treaty. Accordingly, I proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should, in respect of the dominions, be signified by the signature of the dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaty should be drafted accordingly.

Here is an express understanding that the five colonial nations, a part of the British Empire, shall be represented among the signatory nations by the delegates of these several colonies, and that their signatures shall represent the signature of their King. George V, therefore, as a colonial proxy signs the various documents connected with the peace treaty, with the league of nations, and any other treaties with the country, like that for the preservation of France in case of another attack, like the treaty with Poland, or the treaty with Italy. The signature of the delegate from Canada represents George V. Lloyd-George and the British Parliament evidently made no objection to that procedure. Having been carried out in that way, the British Crown's signature to a public document represents the Dominion of Canada, and the other four as well by their consent. That is a sovereign act.

No objection being made, no criticism by any authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain to that method adopted by her several colonies to represent themselves, I am justified in the conclusion I draw that that was the method adopted by these different nations for each to receive the status of an independent sovereign power.

Now, let me read from the league:

> These powers—
> After enumerating them—
> being described in the present treaty as the principal allied and associated powers.

They are the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan.

Then, again, the remainder of the 32 signatory nations are recited below in the same paragraph or article, and it is defined further that these latter powers constitute, "with the principal powers mentioned above, the allied and associated powers."

Mr. President, at the end of Part I, which is the league of nations, we find in the annex these descriptive words:

ORIGINAL MEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SIGNATORIES OF THE TREATY OF PEACE.

United States of America.
Belgium.
Bolivia.
Brazil.
British Empire.

Then follow, after the signature "British Empire," on page 43 of the treaty:

Canada.
Australia.
South Africa.
New Zealand.
India.

Does any other country so sign? Down below a short way I come to the signature of France, one of the principal allied and associated powers. There does not follow after the signature of France Algiers, any part of the Franco-African settlement, any of the territorial possessions of the French Republic anywhere in the world. Why, after the signature of Great Britain, do her five colonies follow? It seems to me that there is a purpose in attaching their names in the annex to the treaty. It must be for the purpose of fitting in with the interpretation of Sir Robert Borden that Canada has the status of a foreign nation, that the signature of its delegate, or when attached in the name of the British King, is to be considered as the signature of Canada, and no objection is made anywhere, either by the United Kingdom or by any of its authorities.

I can not see, Mr. President, why the signatures of these five nations are had in the league. Neither can I understand why they are included as 5 of the 32 signatory nations. To me, and to any other Senator who is disposed to exercise his thinking apparatus, there is no answer for it. If the thinking is done upon the White House hill, if we are mere Executive echoes, I can understand how six is equal to one, and why these signatures to the league of nations—five of them—are of no avail. They are alleged to be mere formalities.

It seems to me, however, that on the face of the league of nations there is evidence of bad faith, evidence of furtive interpretation. There is abundant reason to believe that the articles of the league, when interpreted, will bear the provision for six-to-one voting strength upon all questions affecting the British Empire.

Why not leave that out? Why does the Dominion of Canada insist upon being considered one of the 32 signatory nations if there will be no vote upon any vital question after the league shall become operative?

I continue now, reading from the Borden article:

This proposal was adopted in the form of a memorandum by all the Dominion prime ministers at a meeting which I summoned and was put forward by me on their behalf to the British Empire delegation, by whom it was accepted.

That is referring to the status of Canada as an independent nation in the league.

The proposal was subsequently adopted by the conference and the various treaties have been drawn up accordingly, so that the dominions appear therein as signatories and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

If their concurrence is given "in the same manner as that of other nations," to use the language of Mr. Borden, then their power in the league, and their voting strength, regardless of the specious interpretations put upon it in this Chamber, continue in the league, and will upon proper occasions be exercised.

This important constitutional development involved the issuance by the King, as high contracting party, of full powers to the various Dominion plenipotentiary delegates. In order that such powers issued to the Canadian plenipotentiaries might be based upon formal action of the Canadian Government, an order in council was passed on April 10, 1919, granting the necessary authority. Accordingly I addressed a communication to the prime minister of the United Kingdom requesting that necessary and appropriate steps should be taken to establish the connection between this order in council and the issuance of the full powers by His Majesty, so that it might formally appear of record that they were issued on the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

CANADA AND THE LEAGUE.

The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league.

I would very much like to have Senators, especially the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], explain this portion of Sir Robert Borden's article. It is only carrying out what was said in debate in the Canadian Parliament, read into the RECORD by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and referred to in discussion here by other Senators. It is only in substance saying that the status of those colonies is that of any other nation in the league. Are other nations denied powers of voting? Are they disfranchised because they are members or connected with some colony? These colonies are claiming the independent, sovereign powers of other nations. I wish to find out, Mr. President, whether in the ballot box in this league six ballots for a candidate will be equal to one for some other candidate. Not in American politics or in the science of American Government will that be so. They do not vote that way in the stockyards. They do not vote that way in Delaware or Rhode Island. They will not vote that way in the Mississippi Valley from that river's source in Minnesota to the Delta in the Gulf.

Senators will not be so facetious in any State where there is a reasonably close political fight. In those where there is nothing after the nomination no fears need be entertained. But in every State in the Union outside of those where free self-government does not exist and where government is not by oligarchy, Mr. President, it will not be so much a matter of idle comment or of political comedy as it appears now.

The new and definite status of the Dominion at the peace conference, it is said, is manifested by the league of nations—manifested by the signatures on page 43. Treaties are not signed by subject powers. Treaties are signed by sovereigns. There is no such thing as a treaty among subject powers. Treaty making is a sovereign act. Of itself it imports sovereignty. It requires no interpretation when a treaty is signed to say that the signatures represent sovereignties and not subjects. Therefore when it is said, in referring to the league of nations here, that it is significant, I turn to the 5 signatures of these 32 signatory nations and find already there Great Britain's colonial possessions. All the interpretation, all the specious reasoning, all the casuistry, I repeat, if you went back to the days when it was an exact science, can not interpret the signatures of these powers, except as independent, sovereign powers, entitled to all the rights to vote upon vital questions that every other nation has.

Under the rules and regulations they will have that power except when they are parties to the dispute, and thereby excluded by the express terms of the league itself. The statement continues:

The league of nations' commission—

As near as I can understand, I think that was the subcommittee, if we might so phrase it, having in charge the preparation in due form of the league to present to the full conference—

The league of nations' commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany the status of the dominions—

That is, speaking of all of them—

the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and council was fully recognized.

They are to become members as signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members.

The prime minister of Canada so interprets it. It remains for Senators in this Chamber to interpret it otherwise. It does not require any vivid imagination to foresee that when Great Britain and Canada interpret this question or this power they will interpret it as Canada's prime minister suggests. What will we do? We will come in with a reservation, certainly, and say that a reservation gave as our interpretation only one vote to the British Empire. Of what avail will that be after we are in?

Although neither of the Senators from Virginia is here, one being unfortunately ill, I want to talk a moment about the State of Virginia, not in any sense of criticism but to refer historically to the ratification of the Federal Constitution by the State of Virginia nearly 132 years ago.

The Old Dominion, as the State was called then, attached a reservation to their ratification of the Federal Constitution. It was at that time the first State in the Union in population. In commercial importance it excelled even New York. It was greater in its statesmanship at that time than any of the other States of the Union. Of the whole thirteen it was the leader.

When the Constitution was presented to be ratified they attached a reservation. Jefferson Davis referred to that many times in his public life. The reservation made by Virginia was referred to many times during "the war between the States," as they called it. In Pollard's History of the Lost Cause it is commented on. Alexander H. Stephens quoted it in his debate on the right of a State to withdraw from the Union. In the many arguments upon that question it was said that that was an implied right and required no reservation, but Virginia expressly reserved it. That was a reserved interpretation put upon the document itself.

When the ordinances of secession were passed and when Virginia passed her ordinance, did that save her? Did that keep her from being regarded as an enemy of the Federal Government? Did that reservation save her from having the Army and Navy of the United States employed against her and taking the field against the armies of the State that were put in operation against the powers of the Union? Nobody paid any attention to it in the clash of arms. The day of argument had passed, and when the Civil War was over the right to withdraw from the Union, however it might have been a matter of forensic discussion, ceased in all parliamentary bodies in this country to be a subject of sober discussion. Whatever might have been the force of it as a reservation, it has been condemned both by the Supreme Court and in arguments in every parliamentary body outside of those concerned in withdrawing from the Union; it has been put to rest finally by force of arms and by the onward march of events.

As far as a reservation in a constitutional document or anything of its character, like the league of nations, is concerned, when once you are in the reservations adopted are of no consequence, and none of the members are bound to observe them. It will be our interpretation. The only way it will be of value to us will be to free us from the imputation of bad faith. When we go in, like Virginia, we will have our interpretation attached to the ratification, making it a part of our approval of the league and the treaty. If we are afterwards asked, through Congress or the Executive, to act otherwise than in accordance with our reservations we can reply that we became members on those conditions. It will free us from any imputation of bad faith, from any charge of a breach of our obligations. It will enable us to pursue our course nationally, but if the force of arms is applied it will be no answer to us if the league of nations of the world send their armies and navies to our shores.

I shall vote for the reservations in order to free us of any charge of breaking faith in the event our interpretations become material in our foreign relations. Upon our domestic questions, it can accomplish nothing. Our domestic affairs will move on without regard to the league of nations. Whatever the resolution of ratification may amount to in the Senate; whatever any Executive order published may be, there is a greater power than the Senate; there is a superior governmental power to that of the Executive. It will be the sober second thought of the American people; it will act along the established channels of peaceable, orderly government. But they will make themselves felt when we resolve ourselves into the good Samaritan of the world, to give of our wealth and of our blood, and, all without money and without price, only to be thanked and called the easiest power to approach in the world and get something for nothing. When we are asked to continue this course, after awhile the American people will be heard.

A similar question arose—

Continues Mr. Borden—

in respect of the constitution of the international labor organization. Corresponding to the council of the league, there is a labor governing body consisting of delegates nominated by a limited number of governments. The original form of the labor convention did not adequately recognize the status of the dominions, and at the plenary session of April 11, 1919, when a resolution was proposed that the peace conference approve of the draft convention, I moved that the resolution be amended by adding a provision which authorized the drafting committee to make such amendments as were necessary to have the convention conform to the league of nations in the character of its membership and in the method of adherence. As a result the labor convention was finally amended so that the dominions—

"The dominions," speaking of all of them—were placed on the same footing as other members of the international labor organization, becoming eligible like others to nominate their government delegates to the governing body.

The recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British prime minister and his colleagues.

For the first time, in anything we have been able to ascertain in any document submitted to us, we learn that the British prime minister and his colleagues favored unwaveringly the separate sovereign representation of the dominions, and until the letter that has been quoted many times was read on the floor of this Chamber we had nothing to indicate what the prime minister and his colleagues thought of this power. But here Canada, speaking through its prime minister, informs us in matter that is corroborative of the letter of Lloyd-George, Clemenceau, and others. So we are gradually gathering the circumstantial evidence that gives to Great Britain six votes on all vital questions that may arise under the league.

I read again:

The constitutional structure of the British Empire is imperfectly understood by other nations, even by a nation so close in kinship, in language, and in the character of its institutions as the United States of America.

There has been but one lucid statement of the constitution of the British Empire and the relations of self-governing colonies of the United Kingdom, and that was made last week by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], where he stated in unanswerable terms the conditions under which the British Empire holds its various colonies and their relations to the home Government in London.

It is said here in a patronizing sort of way that we do not understand the structure of the British Empire. That may be so. That may be the cause of much criticism that has been made by visiting Englishmen. Some of the Englishmen who are here now, in a superior sort of way, say that America does not understand the principles of colonial empire; that the United States does not understand the great principles of constitutional government; that England has had 700 years of experience in constitutional government, while we have only had 132 years. We appear to be uninformed, callow, local, and subject to criticism by English authorities.

I am reminded that there is a gentleman in Washington who represents a newspaper of London who has in letters said that Senators were guilty of treason in opposing the orders issued by the Executive of this country to ratify the treaty and the league out of hand as sent to them and make no sacrilegious criticism; that it is a species of legislative blasphemy to question anything the Executive demands to be done in this Chamber.

That same newspaper man has been in the country for 20 or 25 years. Of course he keeps his allegiance intact to Great Britain, or to the United Kingdom rather, because of his persistent crusade in this country for the superiority of everything English in character, and of the crudeness and unfitness of this country to govern itself without help from London. During the administration of a former President he asked the President to intervene with the King of England that he might have an order of knighthood conferred upon him for his distinguished services here. The gentleman is still in Washington. I see him sometimes in the press gallery of the Senate. He has all the privileges there of any other newspaper correspondent, but he has arrogated to himself the privilege of writing down Senators as guilty of treason in this body for not obeying Executive orders in this country.

I only refer to this supercilious snob to show to what advanced lengths our British cousins have now gone in telling us how to govern ourselves and how to ratify treaties in the Senate. It is not by the advice of such as he, or any of his kind that come to this country, that we are an independent power to-day.

I have said many times that I have great respect for the Kingdom of Great Britain. The United Kingdom is one of the greatest countries in the world. Any country with 46,000,000 population that can govern around the world, that can make ill-concealed criticisms and covert sarcasm and thrusts at this country, and then have the sublime assurance, through the house of J. P. Morgan & Co., to carry an advertisement in to-day's paper urging the taking of a loan of $250,000,000 at 5½ per cent—any country that has the supreme arrogance to do this, certainly, if her nerve is her asset, exceeds in resources that of any other country in the world. I say I respect them, but I do not follow their advice. If such as he or his kind are to give us advice and we follow it, it would be vastly better that we were a colonial possession of Great Britain yet. It is only because of the Declaration of Independence, of George Washington, and of George III, who was not an English King, who was of German blood, as Oliver Wendell Holmes said, a snuffy old drone from the German hive, with the usual obstinacy that goes with his kind, with his stupid vacillating ministry, and against the protest of Edmund Burke and the elder Pitt, regarding not at all their statements of the justice of the claims of these colonies—we can thank those agencies that we are independent. We might otherwise have been like Canada and Australia.

Why, even New Zealand and Australia come across to us with advice, and by the daily papers that are controlled by the international bankers of New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia we are regaled nearly every Sunday with long articles about what a beautiful country Australia is, what a great territorial dominion it is, nearly equal in the island alone to the whole area of the United States, and with about six and one-half or seven million population. They tell us about their great resources, of their methods of government, superior to those of any other country in the world.

One of my friends of English descent, a neighbor of mine, was talking to me about it. He is always quoting what New Zealand and Canada are doing, and that we ought to take their advice on the league of nations, because they are so much wiser, both of them, than we are. I dispose of Australia in one sentence, that Australia might be superior, but all of the first families of Australia were descended from the convicts that left their country for their country's good. Of course, when they arrived there was plenty of fresh air and liberty, and they were free from temptation. It was originally a convict colony. I do not mean that all of them are now descended from convicts. It has had, since it developed, a very great immigration from that and other countries, but I still decline to take advice from Australia. I prefer to follow the traditions of my own country.

Let me read the rest of this:

The constitutional structure—

They say—

of the British Empire is imperfectly understood by other nations—

I repeat that—even by a Nation so closely allied in kinship, in language, and in the character of its institutions as the United States of America. Such lack of comprehension need excite no surprise, because the association between the mother country and the great self-governing dominions has been for years in a condition of development, and that development is not yet complete.

The British North America act of 1867, referred to by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on last Friday, set forth at some length the relations between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and her colonies. That, following the acts of 1915 and 1916, of the fifth, sixth, and seventh years of the reign of George V, further defining the relations between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and certain of her colonies, especially Canada, a kind of Canadian settlement act, very definitely established the sovereignty of these colonies. They became independent nations, with full right of home rule, and only in the foreign relations of peace and war, in matters of diplomacy with foreign countries, are they bound to consult the mother country.

The future relationship of the nations of the empire must be determined in accordance with the will of the mother country and of each Dominion in a constitutional conference to be summoned in the not distant future. Undoubtedly it will be based upon equality of nationhood. Each nation must preserve unimpaired its absolute autonomy, but it must likewise have its voice as to those external relations which involve the issue of peace or of war. So that the Britannic commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded on the 28th of last June.

On behalf of my country, I stood firmly upon this solid ground: That in this, the greatest of all wars, in which the world's liberty, the world's justice—in short, the world's future destiny—were at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifices had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable—of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources, and population, no more complete in their sovereignty and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

And the closing words are most significant—

I now ask, Mr. President, to insert the whole of this article by Sir Robert Borden, taken from the New York Sun of October 7, 1919, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Sun, Oct. 7, 1919.]

CANADA'S STATUS AS A NATION WITHIN THE BRITISH EMPIRE TOLD BY PREMIER—SIR ROBERT BORDEN EXPLAINS DIPLOMATIC POSITION ACHIEVED BY DOMINION AT THE PEACE CONFERENCE—TELLS OF ITS RELATION, AS A SELF-GOVERNING BRITANNIC COUNTRY, TO THE TREATY.

(By the Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, G. C. M. G., P. C.)

The status of the Dominions at the peace conference was the subject of long and earnest discussion. Various methods, which it is not necessary to explain, were suggested. In the end I proposed that there should be a distinctive representation for each Dominion similar to that accorded to the smaller allied powers, and, in addition, that the British Empire representation of five delegates should be selected from day to day from a panel made up of representatives of the United Kingdom and the Dominions. This proposal was adopted by the imperial war cabinet.

Early in December preliminary conversations on the making of peace took place in London between representatives of the British Empire, of France, and of Italy, and the proposal which I had already put forward was accepted in principle. The preliminary peace conference began at Paris on January 12, 1919, and the question of procedure, including that of representation, was immediately taken up by the representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, afterwards commonly known as the council of ten. At first strong objection was made to the proposed representation of the British Dominions. Subsequently there was a full discussion in the British Empire delegation, at which a firm protest was made against any recession from the proposal adopted in London. In the end that proposal was accepted.

CANADA'S REPRESENTATION.

The adoption of the panel system gave to the Dominions a peculiarly effective position. At plenary sessions there were sometimes three Canadian plenipotentiary delegates, two as representatives of Canada and one as representative of the Empire. Moreover, throughout the proceedings of the conference, the Dominion delegates, as members of the British Empire delegation, were thoroughly in touch with all the proceedings of the conference and had access to all the papers recording its proceedings.

This enabled them to watch and check those proceedings effectively in the interest of their respective Dominions and placed them in a position of decided advantage. Dominion ministers were nominated to and acted for the British Empire on the principal allied commissions appointed by the conference from time to time to consider and report upon special aspects of the conditions of peace.

On several occasions I was charged with the duty of attending as one of the British Empire representatives on the council of five. Mr. Lloyd-George called upon me to put forward before the council of four the British Empire case in respect of the clauses on economic questions, on the international control of ports, waterways, and railways, and on submarine cables. During the last month of my stay in Paris I acted regularly as chairman of the British Empire delegations in the absence of the prime minister of the United Kingdom, whose duties as a member of the council of four constantly prevented his attendance.

A STEP FORWARD.

It is desirable to note an important development in constitutional practice respecting the signature of the various treaties concluded at the conference. Hitherto it has been the practice to insert an article or reservation providing for the adhesion of the dominions. In view of the new position that had been secured, and of the part played by dominion representatives at the peace table, we thought this method inappropriate and undesirable in connection with the peace treaty. Accordingly, I proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should in respect of the dominions be signified by the signature of the dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaties should be drafted accordingly. This proposal was adopted in the form of a memorandum by all the dominion prime ministers at a meeting which I summoned, and was put forward by me on their behalf to the British Empire delegation, by whom it was accepted. The proposal was subsequently adopted by the conference and the various treaties have been drawn up accordingly, so that the dominions appear therein as signatories and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

This important constitutional development involved the issuance by the King, as high contracting party, of full powers to the various dominion plenipotentiary delegates. In order that such powers issued to the Canadian plenipotentiaries might be based upon formal action of the Canadian Government, an order in council was passed on April 10, 1919, granting the necessary authority. Accordingly I addressed a communication to the prime minister of the United Kingdom requesting that necessary and appropriate steps should be taken to establish the connection between this order in council and the issuance of the full powers by His Majesty so that it might formally appear of record that they were issued on the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

CANADA AND THE LEAGUE.

The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations' commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and council was fully recognized.

They are to become members as signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members. An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard was secured by me, and is of record in the archives of the peace conference.

A similar question arose in respect of the constitution of the international labor organization. Corresponding to the council of the league, there is a labor-governing body consisting of delegates nominated by a limited number of Governments. The original form of the labor convention did not adequately recognize the status of the dominions, and at the plenary session of April 11, 1919, when a resolution was proposed that the peace conference approve of the draft convention I moved that the resolution be amended by adding a provision which authorized the drafting committee to make such amendments as were necessary to have the convention conform to the league of nations in the character of its membership and in the method of adherence. As a result the labor convention was finally amended so that the dominions were placed on the same footing as other members of the international labor organization, becoming eligible like others to nominate their Government delegates to the governing body.

The recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British Prime Minister and his colleagues. The constitutional structure of the British Empire is imperfectly understood by other nations, even by a nation so closely allied in kinship, in language, and in the character of its institutions as the United States of America. Such lack of comprehension need excite no surprise, because the association between the mother country and the great self-governing dominions had been for years in a condition of development, and that development is not yet complete.

FUTURE RELATIONS.

The future relationship of the nations of the empire must be determined in accordance with the will of the mother country and of each dominion in a constitutional conference to be summoned in the not distant future. Undoubtedly it will be based upon equality of nationhood. Each nation must preserve unimpaired its absolute autonomy, but it must likewise have its voice as to those external relations which involve the issue of peace or of war. So that the Britannic commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded on the 28th of last June.

On behalf of my country I stood firmly upon this solid ground: That in this, the greatest of all wars, in which the world's liberty, the world's justice—in short, the world's future destiny—were at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American Continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifices had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources, and population, no more complete in their sovereignty, and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now come, Mr. President, to interpretations put upon the membership in the league of the five British colonies. On the 26th day of May, 1919, during an address by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], a colloquy took place between the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The Senator from Nebraska, interrupting the Senator from Missouri, used the following language, partly in the form of a statement and partly as an interrogatory:

My judgment is that if Great Britain and France do not object to these small nations, that are practically under the protection of the United States, being financed by the United States, and largely controlled by the United States, coming into the league, it is not likely that we will suffer very much from them.

This is found on page 238 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. The Senator from Missouri said:

I am asking the Senator if he is willing to consent to the proposition? Can we not have a categorical answer? Is the Senator willing to put these 50,000 negroes—up as the equals of the 110,000,000 people of the United States?

Speaking of Liberia—

Each having an equal vote in the league.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has named any country that is not practically under the protection of the United States?

Not long ago the President of the Republic of Liberia was in Washington. Was he here in order to discover some method of reclaiming the cannibals and the voodoo worshipers in the back country of Liberia? Was he here for purposes of consultation, to ascertain if some method could be devised to bring about greater progress in his country than he or his agents are making at the present time? He was here for the purpose of obtaining the balance of a loan made available under taxes levied and bond issues raised from American taxpayers. Liberia has not exhausted herself in war. She may occasionally have some trouble with the snake charmers in the back country; it is barely possible that some of the barbarian dances indulged in by the voodoo worshipers require a little discipline at times; but beyond that matter of domestic administration and the restraining the conduct of some of his constituents toward missionaries—beyond a few domestic questions of that kind, no great overpowering necessity for funds has descended upon the Liberian Republic. But still we are loaning Liberia money, and the President of Liberia came here to collect the last installment of the loan. When that had been properly provided for he took his departure to that distant land of the free and the home of a great variety.

Further on the Senator from Nebraska asked:

Will the Senator explain what they—

Referring to the smaller nations—can vote on? I think that would be interesting.

The Senator from Missouri replied:

On anything that America can vote on in the league of nations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. REED. Ah, does the Senator claim that the league of nations has nothing to do? Let us have it out. Does it have nothing to do, or does it have something to do?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The league has very little to do.

Mr. REED. Then the league is a fake, is it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Practically all of its powers, as the Senator well knows if he has studied the constitution of the proposed league, are in the hands of the executive council, and the only five permanent members of that executive council are the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

Later on the Senator from Nebraska said:

He has stated—

Referring to the Senator from Missouri—

that the small nations which he has named will have as great a vote as the United States, when he knows as a matter of fact that no nation, not one of the five permanent members of the executive council, can have as much vote, influence, and power as the five members named on the executive council permanently; he knows that.

Now, let me read further from another colloquy in the same speech as a foundation for some subsequent comment at length. I read from page 243. The senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] said:

Mr. President, I did not raise the question for the purpose of discussing the merits of the people of Siam, but the hereditary monarch and the ruling classes, according to their form of government, are educated and well-informed persons, like the Senator from Missouri. I think, therefore, that, representing their Government, they can speak with intelligence and knowledge of the world. But that he is a monarch does not interest me, nor should it interest us in the effort to create a league of nations. We must accept the nations as they are, and possibly under the inspiration of the league there will be a broader democracy in the future.

Further, he said:

In so far as they are members of the league they will vote. I do not know how far it will affect the destinies of the United States; but very little, I imagine. They are civilized.

* * * * * * *

There is no question of equality involved in the organization of the league, so far as control is concerned, because the larger nations, four or five of them, are established permanently in control.

I have read these quotations from the remarks of Senators who are now active in supporting the league as presented to us in its original form without reservation or amendment in order to comment upon a peculiar feature presented by their statements.

It has been said here repeatedly that under the form of the league it is not a league of nations; it is a mere alliance of some of the principal powers of the world. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in a very able address made some time ago on the league and treaty reminded us of one vital defect in the league. He showed by reference to its various articles that it is a league of men; that, so far as it becomes operative as a government or as a restraining influence upon sovereign powers, it is a government of men and not a government of principles or of law. It does not lay down any great international code; it declares no great principles to regulate the nations in their relations with each other; it simply undertakes to create instrumentalities, and then to say what the instrumentalities through their human agencies may do. It is vastly inferior to either of The Hague conventions, especially the latter one of 1907. That convention declared the great international principles that should govern nations at peace and during war. It laid down new and humanizing doctrines; it prohibited brutal practices even in the stress of war; it regulated the conduct of nations and their navies on the high seas; it prohibited the inhuman acts that were ushered in by the submarine warfare of the Germans. The pending league covenant lays down no such great code of principles. It provides a government purely of men.

I now return to the statements made by the Senators to whom I have referred that it is an alliance of nations, a combination of large powers in which 5 out of the 32 original signatory nations are the controlling powers; or, to use the language of one Senator, "Four or five of them are established permanently in control." The permanent control, therefore, according to the interpretation of the league by some Senators, is limited to five of the great powers, of which the United States is one. Such a league, such an alliance, such a congress composed of five powers, two of which have taken vast areas of territory from the defeated enemy, can not be more than any other alliance or congress of nations; it can not be a league to guarantee permanent peace.

Further, when we speak of the six votes of the British Empire as opposed to the one vote of the United States, the Senator from Nebraska interprets it, and limits that fatal ratio of six to one by saying that the United States will vote such nations as Liberia and others over whom we exercise influence.

Liberia is practically in receivership by the United States now. Haiti and San Domingo are in receivership. We exercise what is practically not a British protectorate, but a preserving protectorate, both for the preservation of domestic peace and of security against external aggression by other countries, over Cuba under the five points in the Platt amendment adopted in this Chamber some years ago. In all the Caribbean Basin, in Central and South America, it is presumed by the inferences of this argument that we will exercise a large influence over all of the Republics, members of the league, in the Western Hemisphere.

It is sought to mitigate the fatal ratio by calling attention to the great number of member nations of the league that will vote, and by the intimation that by going out and gathering in those amenable to our influence we will vote as many or more nations than Great Britain. Great Britain will vote His Majesty the Sultan of Hedjaz; she will vote Persia; she will vote Siam; she will vote Tibet; she probably will vote every other separate principality or power in Asia and Africa, outside of those influenced by whatever government Germany may finally adopt. It will then become a question of influence over other member nations of the league.

I remember in years past the criticisms of many reformers. I have heard it from both sides of various conventions where both parties have been represented. They came along and told us that the bad political boss had to go. He had become persona non grata in public affairs. You know, the habit was charged to be, with various political authorities, that they went out in the counties and districts and States and gathered a great number of delegates. If the delegate did not come himself, if his mother-in-law was ill, or he wanted to go to a baseball game worse than he did to a convention, he just wrote out his proxy and gave it to the political authority who came to him, especially if there was some inducement offered. We all know about it. We have all been guilty. We only raised a tremendous hullaballoo when the other fellow beat us to it.

But magazine writers and various moralists and university professors animadverted at great length on the sinfulness of such practices, and so in time public opinion began to gather strength, and the political boss was denounced as a vicious influence in politics because he went out and gathered a whole State, or a majority, in proxies.

Then there was another practice that was often criticized. It was that the State committee would get together, and sometimes other committees, and they would pass a resolution, and they would frame up as many delegates as they needed to tide over a crisis in their affairs, 5 or 6 in a county, 8 or 10 in another county, and they would all be gathered in, and after a while the bad man would have a majority in the convention. That was creating new proxies when he did not have enough of the crop already in existence. I never had any particular criticism to make of that myself, because I have done as much of it as my enemy has; but public opinion changed, and the reformer came along, and we all decided that there would be no more of it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does my colleague mean to insinuate that somebody might get a proxy from the Hedjaz?

Mr. SHERMAN. I fear that my colleague anticipates my argument. I do mean to insinuate that very thing.

Mr. McCORMICK. I apprehended something of the sort, for I was a novice when my colleague was a priest in the temple of politics.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for the allusion. The Sultan of Hedjaz may be a novice, but the British authorities are no novices in gathering proxies. They are old hands in the proceeding. They began as far back as the time of Warren Hastings, the first governor general of British India, and they have been at it ever since. Once in a while they send a gatherer of proxies to the penitentiary, but seldom. For all the plunder of Warren Hastings, who exercised for the British East India Co. for many years vast governmental as well as commercial powers, upon a great historic occasion, upon a theatrical presentation of the articles of impeachment, upon the six weeks' speech of Edmund Burke, there resulted at last no punishment save that of publicity of this great gatherer of proxies.

They have had more useful experience in it than we have, Mr. President. We can not for a moment suppose that we can go out in the world-wide procedure and gather proxies in competition with the British Empire. What I am interested in, though, is to know that the reformers at last had their way. The day of direct primaries came. Through many national conventions and much dispute the change came. Why, I remember quite well, in 1908, the time when the distinguished ex-President, Mr. Taft, was nominated. I think so great a man as the then President of the United States was not only vigilant but well informed on how to gather proxies in a national convention. I remember that Speaker CANNON at that time offered an amendment to the rules of the national convention. The amendment would have reduced the representation of delegates from the Southern States to conform to the actual votes cast in those States instead of the census returns every 10 years. It provided, further, that when delegates were selected under the primary laws of the States the returns so made from those primaries, properly certified by the State authorities, should be the credentials entitling the delegates to sit in the convention. The President then, controlling at that time the national committee, voted down those amendments, because the seating of delegates from the Southern States in the Republican convention and the unseating of certain other delegates in Northern and Western States, held under primaries or under no primary at all, gave additional delegates in the convention, and all those delegates were needed to nominate Taft as the candidate upon the dictation of the then President of the United States.

In 1912 the same rules were still in force. The same political forces gathered proxies in the same way that they did in 1908. That was contrary to the aroused public sentiment of the age. It caused a great schism in the Republican Party. I think they were wrong both times, in 1908 and in 1912. The change has been made under the rules of the national convention by amendment made in 1914 or 1915, or prior to the convention of 1916. The rules ought to have been changed in 1908. They were not. They ought to have been changed in 1912. They were not. The punishment came in 1912 for a failure to meet the situation either in 1908 or in 1912. The sentiment had been aroused, through the various agencies I have enumerated, until the political boss was no longer tolerated in his harvesting of proxies to control conventions and consequently control nominations. He was to be exterminated by direct primaries. But he rises serene and triumphant amid the sea of ballots gathering majorities and placing his candidates on the ticket. The reformers go down, as usual.

See how we progress, how history repeats itself; how we come along now, and what we are doing in this progressive age, when we are framing a league of nations that shall prevent war perpetually, a reign of universal peace!

This is not a league of nations; it is a league of proxies. It is not a league of sovereign powers; it is a league of international bosses. It is not a progressive movement in its practical operation. As Senators admit on the floor of this Chamber, it is not progressive, but it is reactionary in the deepest sense.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. There is one phase of it which makes for efficiency, which I would not have my colleague overlook. My friend Sir Eric Drummond—a sort of corporation soul, a wise, prudent, and fair-minded Scotchman—himself, and himself alone, constitutes the credentials committee of the league of nations, for he is the chief of the secretariat. That is an improvement on anything which has been devised at home.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is so. I thank my colleague for the timely reminder of the progressive character of the document in actual operation. It is progressive in the sense that everything of this character, when it once begins to operate, always works out its natural result. It is intended to be that way. It is intended to be a corporation soul. It is admitted by Senators who support the league in its original, sacred, unadulterated form that five great nations will control the league.

Sir Eric Drummond, to whom my colleague opportunely referred, is a subject of the United Kingdom of Great Britain. He is now named as the secretary of the secretariat. It is the permanent body which never adjourns; it is always in existence; and Sir Eric is always present where he can function upon every needed occasion. My colleague calls attention to the progressive character of vesting such vast powers in one official. Even evil, Mr. President, is progressive in character. It is like the principle of good. There is no evil where the principle is intrinsicially vicious that is ever content with its original damage inflicted upon the public or upon people. The longer an evil principle once set in operation continues in operation the more vicious it becomes. It works out with heroic fidelity to the logical conclusion of the principle in practice. It is seldom in the history of nations that such vicious principles appear in their extreme forms so early. My colleague and myself want to congratulate the Senate that it appears at this time before we have even taken a vote upon the ratification of this treaty.

Sir Eric Drummond is the most concentrated inhabitant known to history. I remember one time in "Roughing It," Mark Twain found a concentrated inhabitant out on the slope of the Rocky Mountains. He held 10 or 12 offices. He was the one inhabitant of the village who amounted to anything. Besides being blacksmith, agent of an express company, and everything else, he was justice of the peace, notary public, sheriff of the county, and other things which he went on to enumerate. He was the concentrated inhabitant of that whole Rocky Mountain country.

There was the genesis of the league of nations. Sir Eric Drummond is the concentrated inhabitant of the world. With the five principal nations controlling the league of nations, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] says they will, and the league of nations controlling the world, and Sir Eric Drummond functioning for the league of nations, the circle is complete, and we have reached the age of benevolent despotism in world government.

So we have gotten to the point where, in the control within the league of nations itself, it will be a question of gathering proxy nations. We will go down in the Caribbean Sea. Naturally we would expect Cuba to vote with us. She is one of the 32 original signatories to this treaty. Outside of some of the nations of South America that do not feel kindly toward us, because of our refusal to pay money upon various claims they have made against us, we would expect a large number of those Republics to vote with us. In Central America more than likely we would vote the greater part, it is assumed. Mexico very likely would vote with Japan and England. It is not too much to say that we could not claim Mexico as one of our proxies. Our usefulness to Mexico is to furnish our citizens to be kidnapped for ransom. But outside of that country and Colombia, and one or two others, we possibly have a fair chance of having proxies out of all the other nations of the New World, except the Dominion of Canada. Then in Europe, Asia, and Africa the plot will grow interesting when the United Kingdom of Great Britain starts after proxy nations. She already has her five colonial dependencies with local self-government. But she will want more.

Jamaica in the Caribbean Basin is a very promising subject for future exploitation in the league. Next to Costa Rica it is the great banana belt of the world. Probably they will get many of us on the banana proposition, and start a domestic schism in the United States upon that question.

Jamaica can soon be elevated into a self-governing dominion. Take away the bananas that come from Costa Rica from the world's market, and Jamaica dominates one-third the banana market and Great Britain controls.

Why can we not take Cyprus and Malta and Gibraltar in the Mediterranean Basin? It would be a great historical completion of affairs if we were to take Gibraltar as a separate government. It cost Great Britain as much as the independence of these colonies cost us. When she fortified it, when she drilled into the everlasting rock of Gibraltar the places for lodging food and ammunition and planted herself as solidly as the "Rock of Ages" to stay, she spent money, and to-day she holds the British grip as tightly on Gibraltar as any other of her possessions in the world. It has great tactical advantages. Historically how inspiring it would be to say that the Pillars of Hercules, known in classical history, have become a self-governing dominion, and were admitted to the league of nations and had a vote—another proxy for the home country.

The Isthmus of Suez is cut across, and the two cities at either terminus of the canal are the most cosmopolitan places in the world. An old-time classmate of mine, who is a sailor and goes through the canal at Suez on his round-trip voyages to and from a Scottish port, is always telling of the cosmopolitan character of Port Said. It cost a world of money, and these two cities, with this great improvement that connects the oriental waters with the Mediterranean, could well be taken as a self-governing colony. Great Britain will interpret and will settle that question. Her influence will be enough. Of course it takes a vote of the league, a majority or two-thirds of it, I do not recall now which; but the majority or two-thirds, as the case may be, will be within the grasp of Great Britain on admitting new members. There is no reason why the colonies in East Africa, taken from the Germans, that become a part of the Cape-to-Cairo Railroad, may not be admitted. A protectorate over Egypt is now exercised, and has been from the days of Chinese Gordon. No reason appears why Egypt ought not be admitted as one of the colonies of Great Britain, that nation exercising a protectorate over her after she becomes a member of the league.

I will not pursue the subject further. It is enough to say that if this interpretation is right, Mr. President, then it becomes a struggle in the internal affairs of the league to gather proxy nations and vote them, when any controversy arises, especially between this country and Great Britain.

Our own country, Mr. President, ought to concern us somewhat. It has become fashionable to lose sight of our own country. We have become the good Samaritan of the world. We are sending food and money and soldiers every place. We are exhausting our resources, we are attempting to settle the disputes of every country in the world that appeals to us, and finally we will be in the condition that our own house will no longer be in order, and then we will be of no value to anybody else.

I have heard it said here, Mr. President, speaking of unanimous consent, that nothing can be done except by unanimous consent; that no disarmament can be had except by unanimous consent; that no action under article 10 can be had except by unanimous consent; that nothing can be referred to the league of nations that affects the peace of the world, under article 11, except by unanimous consent; that under article 16, the ipso facto declaration of war by the action of any covenant-breaking State requiring the league, through its council, to recommend steps to be taken against the covenant-breaking State, can only be by unanimous consent; that if war be declared under article 10 and external aggression against the territorial boundaries of any member nation be had, any action to repel the threatened invasion or to protect the nation member of the league can only be had by unanimous consent. The political independence of any country can only be protected by unanimous consent of the council; that in the league, except where otherwise specified, certain majorities shall be had, and that in those matters of vital concern, when they are examined, action can only be had by unanimous consent.

Mr. President, if you analyze it with an eye single to that feature, then it is a government of the world by unanimous consent. You can not govern the United States by unanimous consent. You can not govern the first ward in Chicago by unanimous consent, although it is as near a unanimous-consent government as any I know, represented by Mr. Coughlin and by Mr. Michael Kenna, it is nearly unanimous. But there are always some foolish reformers who insist on running somebody against them for aldermen in the first ward in the loop.

In my home town, where a similar element gathers in a certain ward, you would think it would be by unanimous consent, and still vain and impractical men, some of them preachers, some moralists, some merely decent citizens, insisted all the time we had ward government on running somebody in that ward.

In the supposed happiest conditions of mankind I know, even in the days when this prohibition Sahara had not smitten us; in the days when in many places there were wet oases, where the weary pilgrim might have rest and refreshment; in those days when saloons were upon every doorstep, where for block upon block every thirsty soul could find stimulants fitting his requirements; in those days when the saloons named everything in the ward—in Peoria, in Chicago, in Springfield, Quincy, and elsewhere; in those days when to be a dry disciple was to invite destruction politically, even in their own wards and their own cities, you could not govern them by unanimous consent, because there was always somebody who claimed that the reign of the antisaloon folks ought to begin, and they always persisted in running somebody against a saloonkeeper for alderman in his ward.

I remember one time, the only time I was ever defeated at the polls in a political experience of 31 years, just as a protest, after they had had a race riot in Springfield in 1908, I was a candidate for mayor in 1909. I had no ambition to be mayor, the Lord knows. I would just as lief be constable out in a village alongside of the Sangamon River. But we had had a riot extending for four or five blocks, there had been 17 people killed in the riot, and I saw an unnaturalized alien leading a mob of white men in Springfield. A Russian, a riotous creature known to local fame, not to be forgotten, led a mob over across the street in southwestern Springfield, took an old negro cobbler 74 years of age out of his house and hung him to a tree in front of an American schoolhouse across on the other block, as inoffensive an old negro as ever lived in the world. They hung him upon the limb of a tree and shot him full of revolver bullets for no reason under Heaven except that he was a negro living in Springfield, and his lifeless bullet-riddled body lay under the tree in front of an American schoolhouse in Springfield, Ill., in sight of the tomb of Abraham Lincoln, whose mortal hand wrote the emancipation proclamation that gave this murdered man his freedom. When I saw it I said, "If you men of Springfield," and I had only lived there at that time three years, "do not protest against this I will."

I ran for mayor and was beaten by 132 votes by the 215 saloons of Springfield. We could not have unanimous-consent government in Springfield with 215 saloons, and still my distinguished friends want to have unanimous-consent government of the world with not only many nations all over the world but some practicing polygamy and a variety of customs alien to us.

Government by unanimous consent? I remember that a very large saloon keeper came out on the curbstone during that campaign, when they were talking about a dry government. They had governed Springfield for many years. He took me by the lapel of the coat and said, "I want to know, if you are elected mayor of Springfield, what you will do to the saloons of Springfield." I said, "I can enlighten you, my dear sir. As long as Springfield, under the local-option law, votes wet, you can sell liquor under the statutes and the ordinances of the State and the city. If it votes dry, you will sell none. If it remains wet and you do not sell under the laws and ordinances, I will revoke your license, and you will never get it back again while I am mayor." He said, "You are dry. You can never be elected."

That is what beat the saloon keepers of the United States. Whenever you did not give them license to violate every statute and every ordinance, and go scot free over and above the laws of the land, they put you down as a hated dry.

Whenever anybody talks about collective bargaining, whenever a union comes along and says, "Are you in favor of collective bargaining? And you say, "Under proper restrictions and application; yes." "Are you in favor of the open or the closed shop?" "I am in favor of the open shop." "Then you are against organized union labor." I therefore say that collective bargaining, used now in the late industrial conference or in those to come, is an alias for the closed shop. Whenever union labor say, as they say now, that they will not obey an act of Congress if it is passed, and the brotherhoods and their spokesmen say they will not obey, and Mr. Gompers says he will not obey, and will not advise those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor to obey an act of Congress if it becomes the law of the land, they are placing themselves just where the saloon keeper of America placed himself, and they are destined to the same melancholy, but justifiable end.

There is nobody superior to the law of the land, and the brewers and the distillers and saloon keepers found it out, and the labor unions and their leaders, who pervert their sentiments and their leadership, will find it out in this country that there are some hundred millions of people in this country who are not members of the labor unions, that out of nearly 30,000,000 engaged in occupations for pecuniary gain no more than 5,000,000 are members of unionized labor, and they are destined to the same restrictive legislation that came to other men who have declined to obey the laws of the land.

I refer to these two particular instances, Mr. President, because men say we can govern the world by unanimous consent. Some men are savages. The Bedouin Arab does not follow our code. He does not think as we think or act as we act. Even the Turkish Government may become a member of the league of nations. I can think that if the delegate representing the United States should be Bishop Fallows, of the Methodist Church, sitting in a conference, in a council, or the league assembly, and somebody from Constantinople having a harem of 42 wives—as I was reading the other night one has—were representing Turkey and a question came up of international morals, of polygamy or otherwise, how the good bishop would be shocked and with what effort he might endeavor to adjust his ideas of the marital relations in accordance with the plurality practiced by the Sultan and Sultanas of Turkey. It would be indeed a great strain upon the morality of the Christians represented through the bishop.

If, again, property rights represented in the international conference of labor should be attacked, how would they be defended? If the administration of justice in labor controversies should be under attack, how would it be explained? The method of administering justice in the Latin races is very different from that of the Anglo-Saxon races. The procès-verbal of the French court and police forces of Paris and the other principal cities of the French Republic, their process of trial, their methods and laws of evidence are so widely different that it is next to impossible in a labor conference, when the customs of administering justice in controversies of a national or international character is involved, to come together with any degree of unanimity.

And still we are expected, Mr. President, to govern the world by unanimous consent.

I have only the opportunity here, and in a very friendly spirit I make the comment upon my friend in Chicago who was chairman of the purchasing committee and the service of supply in the rear, rendering an invaluable service. He said unanimous consent among purchasing agents of the principal powers, the allied and associated powers, was obtained in the buying of supplies for the Army and supplies of all kinds. He said it was possible to avoid duplicating service and going out in the market outside of the military area and competing among the several nations in the purchases. That is true, but that is under the overpowering necessity of war. Unanimous action must be had in the face of an advancing enemy and with the great powers that faced the allied nations and the United States, it was indispensible that prompt action be had and that it be made effective to meet the emergency presented. Unanimous consent, however, in time of peace is a vastly different subject. We can remember the commission form of government, to illustrate further, for municipalities, when some great calamity—a fire, a flood, an earthquake—visited some city, and men of public spirit have organized themselves and framed a temporary government to meet the emergency. Out of that grew the commission form of government, with three or five men substituted for the city council. Many cities have tried it. They thought because it worked in a great emergency, it would work all the time. But the truth is, Mr. President, we tried it in many cities in Illinois, we tried it in my home city and various other of the municipalities, and it drifts back finally, in times of peace, with no great emergency, to the same old political status, the same old political combination that we have had under the aldermanic form of government, with a numerous city council.

Therefore, what works in a great emergency will not work in the ordinary times of peace. It is said here that unanimous action is a guaranty against any abuse. It will only be during peace in the most formal things that unanimous action can be had.

In all the great events that are vital to the progress or advance of nations, in the development of their national life, in all of those actions where there is the sharp shock of discussion and difference, there is no more possibility of government by unanimous consent than there is in the private affairs of men or in the domestic affairs of nations.

Mr. President, there is another thing that I think is extremely unjust in this overrepresentation. Let me give, offhand, just one illustration: Porto Rico has a population of 1,119,000. New Zealand has a population of 1,099,000. The population of Porto Rico is 732,000 white population and the balance of various other races. The population of Porto Rico is as ancient as that of New Zealand, if not more so. It dates back to the days of the Spanish occupation and during the period of voyage and discovery and subsequently of colonial exploitation. It is a colonial possession of this Government, so far as the United States has one. It is administered as a territorial area, similar to the country before the various States were admitted into the Union after the original thirteen States. There is no more reason why a self-governing colony like Porto Rico should not have its name signed to the league of nations as an original signatory and be entitled to one vote than New Zealand itself should have a separate and distinct vote.

Leaving, now, the question of population, let me read the estimates of the wealth of the various countries of Europe, Asia, and the New World:

The United States is estimated, July 30, 1919, by the Bureau of Statistics, to have $250,000,000,000 of private taxable wealth. The British Empire—Great Britain—which comprises the United Kingdom, composed of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, has a total of $85,000,000,000, barely more than one-third of that of the United States. Canada has $19,000,000,000; Australia has $7,700,000,000—about $112,000,000,000 altogether for the entire Empire of Great Britain, not taking into account British India, whose estimated private taxable wealth can not be ascertained with any degree of accuracy even by British authority. We have, therefore, more than twice the private taxable wealth of the whole British Empire, not including British India; and still six votes are to be given to British representation to our one vote.

In governmental matters, and especially in times of war, as I have several times remarked in this Chamber, the two great factors were the number of men and the ability to pay taxes or to borrow money. The British Empire, outside of British India, with a population of 315,000,000, does not run to more than two-thirds of the population of the United States.

Therefore the military man power of the United States in time of war, either volunteer or draft service, exceeds 33⅓ per cent that of the British Empire, outside of British India. We, therefore, have more private taxable wealth and more potential strength for war than Great Britain and all her colonies, with the exception named.

France has private taxable wealth of $65,000,000,000; Germany of $85,000,000,000; Russia, $60,000,000,000; and Austria-Hungary, $40,000,000,000. That of other nations I will not stop to read. The total for the various nations I have tabulated amounts to $731,000,000,000 of private taxable wealth, of which the United States has more than one-third of all the aggregated wealth of Europe, Asia, and Africa. Still we are asked to go into such a league upon an arrangement of this kind.

When it comes to population, Mr. President, Australia has a population, in round figures, of 5,000,000; she has an area of about 3,000,000 square miles; New Zealand has an area of 103,581 square miles and 1,099,000 population. The Union of South Africa has an area of 473,096 square miles and a population, in round numbers, of 6,000,000. Canada has 3,603,000 square miles and 7,200,000 population. India has 1,802,000 square miles and 315,000,000 population, being the most densely populated of all the British Colonies. The United Kingdom of Great Britain has 121,300 square miles—just about double the area of my own State—and has 45,516,000 population. Those are the areas and the populations, and from them it is easy to estimate the potential military strength.

It is a mistake, Mr. President, that we have 48 States leagued in a single Federal Government at this crisis in our affairs. If the sympathy of the British politicians from 1861 to 1865 had been executed and the war between the States had succeeded, we would have had at least two American powers instead of one. If we had not been so shortsighted in 1787 as to create a Republic with a Federal Government under the present Constitution, we would have had 48 powers or governments instead of one, and we could then well afford to engage in a contest with Great Britain in gathering proxies, for instead of one vote we could have had from 40 to 50 votes. As it is, New York, with 11,000,000 population—twice the population of Australia—has no vote; Pennsylvania, with between seven and eight million population, has no vote; Illinois, with 6,000,000 population, has no vote; while New Zealand, with 1,000,000 population, has a vote in the league. As for the Sultan of Hejaz, nobody knows, for they have not taken the census of his Arabs yet, what the population of his country is, or what his potential military strength may be; but he has one vote. Persia has one vote; the smaller nationalities all have one. Canada, with 7,200,000 population, has a vote, as its prime minister, Sir Robert Borden, exhaustively and conclusively argues from the record of the peace conference and from his own deductions of the relations of the Canadian Dominion to the United Kingdom of Great Britain. So, therefore, we made a mistake in having but a single Government.

I now ask, Mr. President, to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, the tabulated list which I hold in my hand, showing the taxable private wealth of various countries in the New and Old Worlds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The list referred to is as follows:

Estimated wealth of various countries.

United States [1]		$250,000,000,000
British Empire [2]		130,000,000,000
Great Britain [3]	$85,000,000,000
Canada [4]	19,002,788,128
Australia [5]	7,786,400,000
France [6]		65,000,000,000
Germany [6]		85,000,000,000
Russia [6]		60,000,000,000
Austria-Hungary [6]		40,000,000,000
Belgium [2]		9,000,000,000
China [2]		10,000,000,000
Italy [6]		30,000,000,000
Japan [2]		15,000,000,000
Portugal [2]		2,500,000,000
Roumania [2]		1,000,000,000
Serbia
Brazil [2]		15,000,000,000
Turkey [2]		3,000,000,000
Bulgaria
Argentina [7]		13,865,000,000
Denmark [7]		2,000,000,000
Total		731,365,000,000

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to read, Mr. President, from the proceedings of the House of Commons. Lloyd-George was speaking before the House of Commons. He used the language which I shall read in reference to the league of nations. Preceding it, he used this language—and I only interpolate this to explain his remarks:

The Allies have unanimously decided—

This was on the 4th day of July—unanimously decided that the German Kaiser shall be tried by an international tribunal which shall sit in London.

Some irreverent members of the House of Commons on the labor benches said:

So the Kaiser is going to get to London after all!

There was a rattle of laughter from the benches; that was all. Lloyd-George then proceeded to speak of the league of nations in the following language:

I beg no one in Great Britain to sneer at the league of nations. I look on it as a great and a hopeful experiment. I beg that this country may give it a fair and honest trial. Let us try it. It will not stop all trouble. It may stop some.

Undoubtedly it will stop some trouble for Great Britain under article 10 if it remains unimpaired. If the military strength and the taxing power of 110,000,000 people in the United States are understood to be back of Great Britain and her colonial possessions, there is no country in the world but will hesitate a long time to attack her or her dominions if they understand that we are to stand under article 10 as the guarantor in time of war to protect the boundaries and the territorial limits of Great Britain.

Mr. President, there are many other observations I should like to submit on China; but I have already been heard on Shantung. I should like to make some comment in reply to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], but I will reserve that for another occasion.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, herewith I offer certain of Theodore Roosevelt's utterances as appropriate to be incorporated in our proceedings to-day, the anniversary of his birth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMICK. At the time when the country is threatened with disorders—aye, when already it has suffered from outbreaks of lawless violence engendered by wild doctrines voiced by mellifluous philosophers—it is wholesome to recall the blunt and homely sentences which fell from his lips:

"Whenever I have the power," he said in Memphis, in 1907, "I will use every resource of this Nation to stamp out murderous and lawless violence of the kind that breeds the anarchy of which you, Gov. Patterson, spoke. And I shall no more stay my hand if the wrongdoer masquerades as a labor leader than I shall stay my hand if he masquerades as a captain of industry. I have expressed myself once definitely on the subject of undesirable citizens, and I stand by what I said—alike when the undesirable citizen is a great capitalist who wins a fortune by chicanery and wrongdoing to the hurt of his fellows and the damage of the public conscience, and when he is a man who, under the guise of standing for labor, preaches and encourages violence and murder. I think that my position has at least the merit of being easily understood."

And on another occasion, "The triumph of the mob is just as evil a thing as the triumph of the plutocracy, and to have escaped one danger avails nothing whatever if we succumb to the other. Fundamentally they are alike in their selfish disregard of the rights of others; and it is natural that they should join in opposition to any movement of which the aim is fearlessly to do exact and even justice to all."

Contrast with these, the dizzy phrases and distraught sentences calculated to show that now is the hour when the people—or, more exactly, certain elements of the people—are to climb in the saddle to override the very governments chosen by themselves. We Americans are not yet ready to agree to the surrender of representative government to a dictator or to submit to the will of any organized minority, whether of capital or of labor. There was a time when certain barons of the plutocracy would have had us believe that the railroads made the sun to shine and the rain to fall; that it was to them and not to Providence that we owed our plenty, and that to them therefore we should make obeisance. Roosevelt broke their growing domination of public life.

Now another minority threatens the vast majority of the people. Nay, since expediency and panic combined to enact the Adamson law the American people have been threatened with the tyranny of any minority organized and ruthless, ready to raid the country. Thus the coal miners have their program and the international bankers want article 10 of the league covenant.

The plain people, workmen; men and women in the liberal professions, small business men, and the farmers—the farmers of America, Mr. President, are going to save her from the tyranny of the minority as they did under Theodore Roosevelt's leadership. I would to God that he were with us in this hour of peril to the Republic—peril to all that was dear to him. You sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. The Adamson law epitomized the surrender of the Government of all the people to a minority of the people. We are reaping its fruit to-day. Now, we have hearkened to the wild cant that the mooted compact between the nations is greater than the Government of the Constitution. Herein were the auguries of lawlessness and sovietism—unnatural monsters to be born in America. Whites and blacks in mob hysteria have murdered one another. Since we celebrated the birth of Jesus, the Christ, last December, 50 persons, black and white, have been lynched in America—some of them burned at the stake. This madness must end. It will end. The American people will end it.

Mr. President, we know that democracies may err. We know that from time to time majorities decide wrongly. But a people long schooled in the government of its own affairs has a profound consciousness of elemental measures necessary for its own protection. We speak of ours as a government of law. But it is more than that. It is a government of custom, of tradition, of men, a few of them great and many of them devoted to the health and safety of the Commonwealth. Law! You have law in Mexico! You have law and dictatorial oppression and revolution. What is the skeleton of the law unless it be clothed with the flesh of the people among whom it has grown through the ages and unless it be animated by their spirit? That which we have to-day is not perfect. Justice is not so sure, so cheap, and so swift as we would have it. Public administration manifests abuses of waste and favoritism which we condemn and which we would cure. But who would change it, at its worst anywhere in America, for the socialist theory of Karl Marx as applied in Russia by the dictator, Nicholai Lenin?

At the moment when certain conspicuous figures in the world are engendering schemes for a fantastic internationalism, America breathes the spirit of a more fervent and pure nationalism than ever before in her life.

It must needs be so, for it is the history of great peoples, as it is of men, that they come to their full spiritual stature only through pain and effort. America to-day is not merely a vast settlement of mankind upon a new continent, governed upon the legal maxims of democratic doctrinaires. We have strained, tried, tested our theory of the state as have no other democratic people. In six score years the Union has grown from 3,000,000 to over 100,000,000 souls. During the last years before the outbreak of the Great War nearly a million people from the four corners of Europe settled upon our shores every year, in the belief that they and their children were to become bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, to be animated by the spirit of our fathers. In this newest of great countries we have the oldest Constitution in the modern world. We have conserved our inheritance unhurt and undiminished. We live in a Federal Republic, within our continental frontiers secure from the turmoil of Europe and from the dangers of Asia, unless we bring them down upon ourselves. We know that what we are, we know that the institutions which we uphold, are the gifts of devoted men and of great men now dead; above all of them stand Washington, the Father of his Country; Lincoln, its savior; and Theodore Roosevelt, the foremost American of our own day.

America lived and breathed and spoke through the lips of each. They were the fruit of her womb. Her simple virtues and perhaps her rude defects were found in them. Washington was reviled, Lincoln was despised, Roosevelt was hated, each in his own time. Long since America has acclaimed Washington and Lincoln as the greatest among her sons. Now there can be but few envenomed critics of Theodore Roosevelt who would not cry out in protest if by a miracle he could be snatched from America and his genius and manhood awarded to any of the old northlands of Europe from which his forbears came.

I shrink from naming that one proponent of the covenant who publicly has thanked God that Roosevelt is no longer here to join in the debate upon the league of nations.

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurrile jester, is there room for you?

How did Theodore Roosevelt speak upon our foreign policy before he died? I heard him say that we must never submit the control of immigration to international arbitrament. I heard him say that by no equivocation must we abandon our exclusive determination of the Monroe doctrine. A few days later he died. We have the lines, almost prophetic, which he wrote as he neared his end:

"There is not a young man in this country who has fought, or an old man who has seen those dear to him fight, who does not wish to minimize the chance of future war.

"But there is not a man of sense who does not know that in any such movement if too much is attempted the result is either failure or worse than failure.

"Let each nation reserve to itself and for its own decision, and let it clearly set forth, questions which are nonjustifiable.

"Let nothing be done that will interfere with our preparing for our own defense by introducing a system of universal obligatory military training, modeled on the Swiss plan.

"Finally, make it perfectly clear that we do not intend to take a position of an international Meddlesome Matty. The American people do not wish to go into an overseas war unless for a very great cause and where the issue is absolutely plain.

"Therefore we do not wish to undertake the responsibility of sending our gallant young men to die in obscure fights in the Balkans or in Central Europe or in a war we do not approve of.

"Let us put our trust neither in rhetoric nor hypocrisy," said he. "Let us be honest with ourselves. Let us look the truth in the face. * * * Let us trust for our salvation to a sound and intense American nationalism.

"No paper scheme designed to secure peace without effort and safety without service and sacrifice will either make this country safe or enable it to do its international duty toward others."

Here spoke the patriot—eager to defend peace, more eager to defend the honor of his country. He was ready to join the other powers to take measures against war and he was opposed to the creation of a superstate. He had spoken for the conscience and courage of America when others faltered or were dumb.

Silent in death, still he calls us who followed him to follow in the way along which he had led in life.

APPENDIX.

[From an address on "The trusts and the tariff," delivered in the Music Hall, Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1902.]

"Therefore I personally feel that ultimately the Nation will have to assume the responsibility of regulating these very large corporations which do an interstate business. The States must combine to meet the way in which capital has combined, and the way in which the States can combine is through the National Government. But I firmly believe that all these obstacles can be met if only we face them, both with the determination to overcome them, and with the further determination to overcome them in ways which shall not do damage to the country as a whole, which, on the contrary, shall further our industrial development and shall help instead of hindering all corporations which work out their success by means that are just and fair toward all men."

[From an address on "What the Government can do for the wage-earners," delivered at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., Apr. 6, 1903.]

"Very much of our effort in reference to labor matters should be by every device and expedient to try to secure a constantly better understanding between employer and employee. Everything possible should be done to increase the sympathy and fellow feeling between them and every chance taken to allow each to look at all questions, especially at questions in dispute, somewhat through the other's eyes. If met with a sincere desire to act fairly by one another, and if there is, furthermore, power by each to appreciate the other's standpoint, the chance for trouble is minimized. I suppose every thinking man rejoices when by mediation or arbitration it proves possible to settle troubles in time to avert the suffering and bitterness caused by strikes.

"Moreover, a conciliation committee can do best work when the trouble is in its beginning, or, at least, has not come to a head. When the break has actually occurred, damage has been done, and each side feels sore and angry; and it is difficult to get them together, difficult to make either forget its own wrongs and remember the rights of the other. If possible, the effort at conciliation or mediation or arbitration should be made in the earlier stages, and should be marked by the wish on the part of both sides to try to come to a common agreement which each shall think in the interests of the other as well as of itself."

[From an address on "The coal-strike commission," delivered in Omaha, Nebr., Apr. 27, 1903.]

"Any man who tries to excite class hatred, sectional hate, hate of creeds, any kind of hatred in our community, though he may affect to do it in the interest of the class he is addressing, is, in the long run, with absolute certainty, that class's own worst enemy."

[From an address on "Class government," delivered at the State fair in Syracuse, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1903.]

"There is no worse enemy of the wageworker than the man who condones mob violence in any shape or who preaches class hatred; and surely the slightest acquaintance with our industrial history should teach even the most shortsighted that the times of most suffering for our people as a whole, the times when business is stagnant and capital suffers from shrinkage and gets no return from its investments are exactly the times of hardship and want and grim disaster among the poor. If all the existing instrumentalities of wealth could be abolished, the first and severest suffering would come among those of us who are least well off at present. The wageworker is well off only when the rest of the country is well off, and he can best contribute to this general well-being by showing sanity and a firm purpose to do justice to others."

[From an address on "The use of violence in labor troubles," delivered to a strike committee of the Teamsters' Association, presenting a petition in regard to a dispute with the Employers' Association and the suggested calling out of Federal troops in Chicago, May 10, 1905.]

"In upholding law and order, in doing what he is able to do to suppress mob violence in any shape or way, the mayor of Chicago, Mayor Dunne, has my hearty support. I am glad to be able to say this to you gentlemen before I say it to any other body. Now, let me repeat that I know nothing of the facts of the situation. I know nothing of the rights or wrongs of the points at issue. What I have to say is based purely upon what I regard as the unfortunate phrasing of a letter presented to the President of the United States. I have not been called upon to interfere in any way, but you must not misunderstand my attitude. In every effort of Mayor Dunne to prevent violence by mobs or individuals, to see that the laws are obeyed, and that order is preserved he has the hearty support of the President of the United States, and, in my judgment, he should have that of every good citizen of the United States.

* * * * * * *

"The PRESIDENT. Mr. Shea, I can only repeat what I have said. I am a believer in unions. I am an honorary member of one union. But the union must obey the law just as the corporation must obey the law; just as every man, rich or poor, must obey the law. As yet no action whatever has been called for by me, and most certainly if action is called for by me I shall try to do exact justice under the law to every man, so far as I have power. But the first essential is the preservation of law and order, the suppression of violence by mobs or individuals."

[From President Roosevelt's message at the opening of the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, Dec. 5, 1905.]

"The question of securing a healthy, self-respecting, and mutually sympathetic attitude as between employer and employee, capitalist and wageworker, is a difficult one. All phases of the labor problem prove difficult when approached. But the underlying principles, the root principles, in accordance with which the problem must be solved are entirely simple. We can get justice and right dealing only if we put as of paramount importance the principle of treating a man on his worth as a man rather than with reference to his social position, his occupation, or the class to which he belongs. There are selfish and brutal men in all ranks of life. If they are capitalists, their selfishness and brutality may take the form of hard indifference to suffering, greedy disregard of every moral restraint which interferes with the accumulation of wealth, and cold-blooded exploitation of the weak; or, if they are laborers, the form of laziness, of sullen envy of the more fortunate, and of willingness to perform deeds of murderous violence. Such conduct is just as reprehensible in one case as in the other, and all honest and far-seeing men should join in warring against it wherever it becomes manifest. Individual capitalist and individual wageworker, corporation and union, are alike entitled to the protection of the law, and must alike obey the law. Moreover, in addition to mere obedience to the law, each man, if he be really a good citizen, must show broad sympathy for his neighbor and genuine desire to look at any question arising between them from the standpoint of that neighbor no less than from his own; and to this end it is essential that capitalist and wageworker should consult freely one with the other, should each strive to bring closer the day when both shall realize that they are properly partners and not enemies. To approach the questions which inevitably arise between them solely from the standpoint which treats each side in the mass as the enemy of the other side in the mass is both wicked and foolish. In the past the most direful among the influences which have brought about the downfall of republics has ever been the growth of the class spirit, the growth of the spirit which tends to make a man subordinate the welfare of the public as a whole to the welfare of the particular class to which he belongs, the substitution of loyalty to a class for loyalty to the Nation. This inevitably brings about a tendency to treat each man not on his merits as an individual but on his position as belonging to a certain class in the community. If such a spirit grows up in this Republic, it will ultimately prove fatal to us, as in the past it has proved fatal to every community in which it has become dominant. Unless we continue to keep a quick and lively sense of the great fundamental truth that our concern is with the individual worth of the individual man, this Government can not permanently hold the place which it has achieved among the nations. The vital lines of cleavage among our people do not correspond, and, indeed, run at right angles, to the lines of cleavage which divide occupation from occupation, which divide wageworkers from capitalists, farmers from bankers, men of small means from men of large means, men who live in the towns from men who live in the country; for the vital line of cleavage is the line which divides the honest man who tries to do well by his neighbor from the dishonest man who does ill by his neighbor. In other words, the standard we should establish is the standard of conduct, not the standard of occupation, of means, or of social position. It is the man's moral quality, his attitude toward the great questions which concern all humanity, his cleanliness of life, his power to do his duty toward himself and toward others, which really count; and if we substitute for the standard of personal judgment which treats each man according to his merits, another standard in accordance with which all men of one class are favored and all men of another class discriminated against, we shall do irreparable damage to the body politic. I believe that our people are too sane, too self-respecting, too fit for self-government, ever to adopt such an attitude. This Government is not and never shall be government by a plutocracy. This Government is not and never shall be government by a mob. It shall continue to be in the future what it has been in the past, a government based on the theory that each man, rich or poor, is to be treated simply and solely on his worth as a man; that all his personal and property rights are to be safeguarded; and that he is neither to wrong others nor to suffer wrong from others.

"The noblest of all forms of government is self-government; but it is also the most difficult. We who possess this priceless boon, and who desire to hand it on to our children and our children's children, should ever bear in mind the thought so finely expressed by Burke:

"Men are qualified for civil liberty in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites; in proportion as they are disposed to listen to the counsels of the wise and good in preference to the flattery of knaves. Society can not exist unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere, and the less of it there be within the more there must be without. It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things that men of intemperate minds can not be free. Their passions forge their fetters."

"In the exercise of their profession and in the service of their clients these astute lawyers strive to prevent the passage of efficient laws and strive to secure judicial determinations of those that pass which shall emasculate them. They do not invoke the Constitution in order to compel the due observance of law alike by rich and poor, by great and small; on the contrary they are ceaselessly on the watch to cry out that the Constitution is violated whenever any effort is made to invoke the aid of the National Government, whether for the efficient regulation of railroads, for the efficient supervision of great corporations, or for efficiently securing obedience to such a law as the national eight-hour law and similar so-called 'labor statutes.'

"The doctrine they preach would make the Constitution merely the shield of incompetence and the excuse for governmental paralysis; they treat it as a justification for refusing to attempt the remedy of evil, instead of as the source of vital power necessary for the existence of a mighty and ever-growing nation."

[From an address on "Preachers of Discontent and Class Hatred," from the message of the President, read at the opening of the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, Dec. 3, 1906.]

"The triumph of the mob is just as evil a thing as the triumph of the plutocracy, and to have escaped one danger avails nothing whatever if we succumb to the other. In the end the honest man, whether rich or poor, who earns his own living and tries to deal justly by his fellows, has as much to fear from the insincere and unworthy demagogue, promising much and performing nothing. * * * There are at this moment wealthy reactionaries of such obtuse morality that they regard the public servant who prosecutes them when they violate the law, or who seeks to make them bear their proper share of the public burdens, as being even more objectionable than the violent agitator who hounds on the mob to plunder the rich. There is nothing to choose between such a reactionary and such an agitator; fundamentally they are alike in their selfish disregard of the rights of others; and it is natural that they should join in opposition to any movement of which the aim is fearlessly to do exact and even justice to all."

[From an address delivered at Milwaukee, Wis., October 14, 1912.]

PROGRESSIVE CAUSE GREATER THAN ANY INDIVIDUAL.

Just before entering the auditorium at Milwaukee an attempt was made on Col. Roosevelt's life. The speech which follows is from a stenographic report, differing considerably from the prepared manuscript:

"Friends, I shall ask you to be as quiet as possible. I don't know whether you fully understand that I have just been shot, but it takes more than that to kill a Bull Moose. But fortunately I had my manuscript, so you see I was going to make a long speech, and there is a bullet—there is where the bullet went through—and it probably saved me from it going into my heart. The bullet is in me now, so that I can not make a very long speech, but I will try my best.

"And now, friends, I want to take advantage of this incident and say a word of solemn warning to my fellow countrymen. First of all, I want to say this about myself: I have altogether too important things to think of to feel any concern over my own death; and now I can not speak to you insincerely within five minutes of being shot. I am telling you the literal truth when I say that my concern is for many other things. It is not in the least for my own life. I want you to understand that I am ahead of the game anyway. No man has had a happier life than I have led; a happier life in every way. I have been able to do certain things that I greatly wished to do, and I am interested in doing other things. I can tell you with absolute truthfulness that I am very much uninterested in whether I am shot or not. It was just as when I was colonel of my regiment. I always felt that a private was to be excused for feeling at times some pangs of anxiety about his personal safety, but I can not understand a man fit to be a colonel who can pay any heed to his personal safety when he is occupied as he ought to be occupied with the absorbing desire to do his duty.

"I am in this cause with my whole heart and soul. I believe that the Progressive movement is for making life a little easier for all our people; a movement to try to take the burdens off the men and especially the women and children of this country. I am absorbed in the success of that movement.

"Friends, I ask you now this evening to accept what I am saying as absolutely true, when I tell you I am not thinking of my own success. I am not thinking of my life or of anything connected with me personally. I am thinking of the movement. I say this by way of introduction, because I want to say something very serious to our people and especially to the newspapers. I don't know anything about who the man was who shot me tonight. He was seized at once by one of the stenographers in my party, Mr. Martin, and I suppose is now in the hands of the police. He shot to kill. He shot—the shot, the bullet went in here—I will show you.

"I am going to ask you to be as quiet as possible, for I am not able to give the challenge of the bull moose quite as loudly. Now, I do not know who he was or what party he represented. He was a coward. He stood in the darkness in the crowd around the automobile, and when they cheered me, and I got up to bow, he stepped forward and shot me in the darkness.

"Now, friends, of course, I do not know, as I say, anything about him; but it is a very natural thing that weak and vicious minds should be inflamed to acts of violence by the kind of awful mendacity and abuse that have been heaped upon me for the last three months by the papers in the interest of not only Mr. Debs but of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Taft.

"Friends, I will disown and repudiate any man of my party who attacks with such foul slander and abuse any opponent of any other party; and now I wish to say seriously to all the daily newspapers, to the Republican, the Democratic, and the Socialist Parties, that they can not, month in and month out and year in and year out, make the kind of untruthful, of bitter assault that they have made and not expect that brutal, violent natures, or brutal and violent characters, especially when the brutality is accompanied by a not very strong mind; they can not expect that such natures will be unaffected by it.

"Now, friends, I am not speaking for myself at all. I give you my word, I do not care a rap about being shot; not a rap.

"I have had a good many experiences in my time, and this is one of them. What I care for is my country. I wish I were able to impress upon my people—our people—the duty to feel strongly but to speak the truth of their opponents. I say now, I have never said one word against any opponent that I can not—on the stump—that I can not defend. I have said nothing that I could not substantiate and nothing that I ought not to have said—nothing that I—nothing that, looking back at, I would not say again.

"Now, friends, it ought not to be too much to ask that our opponents [speaking to some one on the stage]—I am not sick at all; I am all right—I can not tell you of what infinitesimal importance I regard this incident as compared with the great issues at stake in this campaign, and I ask it not for my sake, not the least in the world, but for the sake of our common country, that they make up their minds to speak only the truth, and not to use the kind of slander and mendacity which if taken seriously must incite weak and violent natures to crimes of violence. Don't you make any mistake. Don't you pity me. I am all right. I am all right, and you can not escape listening to the speech either.

"And now, friends, this incident that has just occurred—this effort to assassinate me—emphasizes to a peculiar degree the need of this Progressive movement. Friends, every good citizen ought to do everything in his or her power to prevent the coming of the day when we shall see in this country two recognized creeds fighting one another, when we shall see the creed of the 'Havenots' arraigned against the creed of the 'Haves.' When that day comes, then, such incidents as this to-night will be commonplace in our history. When you make poor men—when you permit the conditions to grow such that the poor man as such will be swayed by his sense of injury against the men who try to hold what they improperly have won, when that day comes, the most awful passions will be let loose and it will be an ill day for our country.

"Now, friends, what we who are in this movement are endeavoring to do is to forestall any such movement by making this a movement for justice now—a movement in which we ask all just men of generous hearts to join with the men who feel in their souls that lift upward which bids them refuse to be satisfied themselves while their countrymen and countrywomen suffer from avoidable misery. Now, friends, what we Progressives are trying to do is to enroll rich or poor, whatever their social or industrial position, to stand together for the most elementary rights of good citizenship, those elementary rights which are the foundation of good citizenship in this great Republic of ours.

"My friends are a little more nervous than I am. Don't you waste any sympathy on me. I have had an A–1 time in life, and I am having it now.

"I never in my life was in any movement in which I was able to serve with such whole-hearted devotion as in this; in which I was able to feel as I do in this that common weal. I have fought for the good of our common country.

"And now, friends, I shall have to cut short much of the speech that I meant to give you, but I want to touch on just two or three of the points.

"In the first place, speaking to you here in Milwaukee, I wish to say that the Progressive Party is making its appeal to all our fellow citizens without any regard to their creed or to their birthplace. We do not regard as essential the way in which a man worships his God or as being affected by where he was born. We regard it as a matter of spirit and purpose. In New York, while I was police commissioner, the two men from whom I got the most assistance were Jacob Riis, who was born in Denmark, and Oliver Van Briesen, who was born in Germany—both of them as fine examples of the best and highest American citizenship as you could find in any part of this country.

"I have just been introduced by one of your own men here—Henry Cochems. His grandfathers, his father, and that father's seven brothers all served in the United States Army, and they entered it four years after they had come to this country from Germany. Two of them left their lives, spent their lives, on the field of battle. I am all right; I am a little sore. Anybody has a right to be sore with a bullet in him. You would find that if I was in battle now I would be leading my men just the same. Just the same way I am going to make this speech.

"At one time I promoted five men for gallantry on the field of battle. Afterwards in making some inquiries about them I found it happened that two of them were Protestants, two Catholics, and one a Jew. One Protestant came from Germany and one was born in Ireland. I did not promote them because of their religion. It just happened that way. If all five of them had been Jews I would have promoted them, or if all five had been Protestants I would have promoted them, or if they had been Catholics. In that regiment I had a man born in Italy who distinguished himself by gallantry. There was a young fellow, a son of Polish parents, and another who came here when he was a child from Bohemia, who likewise distinguished themselves; and friends, I assure you, that I was incapable of considering any question whatever but the worth of each individual as a fighting man. If he was a good fighting man, then I saw that Uncle Sam got the benefit from it. That is all.

"I make the same appeal in our citizenship. I ask in our civic life that we in the same way pay heed only to the man's quality of citizenship, to repudiate as the worst enemy that we can have whoever tries to get us to discriminate for or against any man because of his creed or his birthplace.

"Now, friends, in the same way I want our people to stand by one another without regard to differences of class or occupation. I have always stood by the labor unions. I am going to make one omission to-night. I have prepared my speech because Mr. Wilson had seen fit to attack me by showing up his record in comparison with mine. But I am not going to do that to-night. I am going to simply speak of what I myself have done and of what I think ought to be done in this country of ours.

"It is essential that there should be organizations of labor. This is an era of organization. Capital organizes and therefore labor must organize.

"My appeal for organized labor is twofold; to the outsider and the capitalist I make my appeal to treat the laborer fairly, to recognize the fact that he must organize, that there must be such organization, that the laboring man must organize for his own protection, and that it is the duty of the rest of us to help him and not hinder him in organizing. That is one-half of the appeal that I make.

"Now, the other half is to the labor man himself. My appeal to him is to remember that as he wants justice, so he must do justice. I want every labor man, every labor leader, every organized union man, to take the lead in denouncing crime or violence. I want them to take the lead in denouncing disorder and in denouncing the inciting of riot; that in this country we shall proceed under the protection of our laws and with all respect to the laws, and I want the labor men to feel in their turn that exactly as justice must be done them so they must do justice; that they must bear their duty as citizens, their duty to this great country of ours; and that they must not rest content unless they do that duty to the fullest degree.

"I know these doctors, when they get hold of me, they will never let me go back, and there are just a few things more that I want to say to you.

"And here I have got to make one comparison between Mr. Wilson and myself, simply because he has invited it and I can not shrink from it.

"Mr. Wilson has seen fit to attack me, to say that I did not do much against the trusts when I was President. I have got two answers to make to that. In the first place, what I did, and then I want to compare what I did while I was President and what Mr. Wilson did not do while he was governor.

"When I took office the antitrust law was practically a dead letter and the interstate-commerce law in as poor a condition. I had to revive both laws. I did. I enforced both. It will be easy enough to do now what I did then, but the reason that it is easy now is because I did it when it was hard.

"Nobody was doing anything. I found speedily that the interstate-commerce law, by being made more perfect, could be made a most useful instrument for helping solve some of our industrial problems. So with the antitrust law. I speedily found that almost the only positive good achieved by such a successful lawsuit as the Northern Securities suit, for instance, was in establishing the principle that the Government was supreme over the big corporation, but that by itself that law did not accomplish any of the things that we ought to have accomplished; and so I began to fight for the amendment of the law along the lines of the interstate-commerce law, and now we propose—we Progressives—to establish an interstate commission having the same power over industrial concerns that the Interstate Commerce Commission has over railroads, so that whenever there is in the future a decision rendered in such important matters as the recent suits against the Standard Oil, the sugar—no, not that—tobacco—Tobacco Trust—we will have a commission which will see that the decree of the court is really made effective; that it is not made a merely nominal decree.

"Our opponents have said that we intend to legalize monopoly. Nonsense. They have legalized monopoly. At this moment the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust monopolies are legalized; they are being carried on under the decree of the Supreme Court.

"Our proposal is really to break up monopoly. Our proposal is to put in the law—to lay down certain requirements, and then require the commerce commission—the industrial commission—to see that the trusts live up to those requirements. Our opponents have spoken as if we were going to let the commission declare what the requirements should be. Not at all. We are going to put the requirements in the law and then see that the commission requires them to obey that law. * * *

"I ask you to look at our declaration and hear and read our platform about social and industrial justice, and then, friends, vote for the Progressive ticket without regard to me, without regard to my personality, for only by voting for that platform can you be true to the cause of progress throughout this Union."

[A speech made before the Illinois Bar Association at Chicago, April 29, 1916.]

NATIONAL DUTY AND INTERNATIONAL IDEALS.

"A year and three-quarters have passed since the opening of the Great War. At the outset our people were stunned by the vastness and terror of the crisis. We had been assured by many complacent persons that the day of great wars had ended, that the reign of violence was over, that the enlightened public opinion of the world would prevent the oppression of weak nations. To be sure, there was ample proof that none of these assurances were true, and far-seeing men did not believe them. But there was good excuse for the mass of the people being misled. Now, however, there is none. War has been waged on a more colossal scale than ever before in the world's history; and cynical indifference to international morality and willingness to trample on inoffensive, peace-loving people who are also helpless or timid have been shown on a greater scale than since the close of the Napoleonic wars over a century ago. Alone of the great powers we have not been drawn into this struggle.

"A twofold duty was imposed upon us by the fact of our prosperity and by the fact of our momentary immunity from danger. This twofold duty was, first, to make our voice felt for the weak who had been wronged by the strong, and for international humanity and honor, and for peace on terms of justice for all concerned; and, second, immediately and in thoroughgoing fashion to prepare ourselves so that there might not befall us on an even greater scale such a disaster as befell Belgium. We have signally failed in both duties. Incredible to relate, we are not in any substantial respect stronger at this moment in soldiers or rifles, in seamen or ships, because of any governmental action taken in consequence of this war; and moreover we have seen every device and provision designed by humanitarians to protect international rights against international wrongdoings torn into shreds, and have not so much as ventured to speak effectively one word of protest.

"The result is that every nation in the world now realizes our weakness, and that no nation in the world believes in either our disinterestedness or our manliness. The effort to placate outside nations by being neutral between right and wrong, and to gain good will along professional pacifist lines by remaining helpless for self-defense, has resulted, after two fatuous years, in so shaping affairs that the nations either already feel, or are rapidly growing to feel, for us not only dislike but contempt.

"This is not a pleasant truth, but it is the truth; and as a people we will do well to remember Emerson's saying that in the long run the most unpleasant truth is a safer traveling companion than the pleasantest falsehood. Our duty is to face the facts, and then to take the thoroughgoing action necessary in order to meet the situation that these facts disclose.

"Our prime duty, infinitely our most important duty, is the duty of preparedness. Unless we prepare in advance we can not when the crisis comes be true to ourselves. If we can not be true to ourselves, it is absolutely certain that we shall be false to everyone else. If we are not able to safeguard our own national honor and interest, we shall make ourselves an object of scorn and derision if we try to stand up for the rights of others. We have been sinking into the position of the China of the Occident, and we will do well to remember that China—pacifist China—has not only been helpless to keep its own territory from spoliation and its own people from subjugation but has also been helpless to exert even the most minute degree of influence on behalf of right dealing among other nations.

"There are persons in this country who openly advocate our taking the position that China holds, the position from which the best and wisest Chinamen are now painfully trying to raise their land. Nothing that I can say will influence the men and women who take this view. The holding of such a view is entirely incompatible with the right to exercise the privileges of self-government in a democracy, for self-government can not permanently exist among people incapable of self-defense.

"But I believe that the great majority of my fellow countrymen, when they finally take the trouble to think on the problem at all, will refuse to consent to or acquiesce in the Chinafication of this country. I believe that they will refuse to follow those who would make right helpless before might, who would put a pigtail on Uncle Sam and turn the Goddess of Liberty into a pacifist female huckster, clutching a bag of dollars which she has not the courage to guard against aggression. It is to these men and women that I speak. I speak to the mass of my fellow countrymen. I speak to all men and women who are loyal to the principles of those who in the Revolutionary War made us a Nation and who have in their souls the high qualities possessed by the men who in the iron days of the Civil War followed the banners of Grant and of Lee, and of the mothers and wives of these men. My appeal may not be heeded; if so, then either our people will pay heed in time to the appeal of some other man, able to speak more strongly and more convincingly, or else they will when it is too late learn the lesson from some terrible gospel in which it is written by an alien conqueror in letters of steel and of flame.

"The first necessity is that we shall in good faith and without reservation undertake to be a nation, and not merely to call ourselves a nation. I make my especial appeal to the national spirit here in Chicago, here in the great Middle West, here in the territory stretching from the Alleghenies to the Rockies. The prophets of gloom have said that the West, prosperous and indifferent, secure in her fancied safety because she is in the middle of the continent, cares nothing for the dangers that might befall the cities on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, cares nothing for what has befallen the dwellers along the Mexican boundary, and is as indifferent to what befalls elsewhere, as Peking once was to what befell its outlying Chinese Provinces—to the ultimate ruin of Peking, by the way. This I do not for one moment believe. If I did I should despair of the Republic. This is to a peculiar degree the democratic, the intensely and characteristically American, section of our land. The West produced for the service of the whole Nation Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Jackson, and I know that their spirit is still the spirit of her sons.

"I appeal to the men of the West to take the lead in the movement for the genuine nationalization of our people. If the Republic founded by Washington and saved by Lincoln is to be turned into a mere polyglot boarding house, where dollar hunters of 20 different nationalities scramble for gain, each nationality bearing no real allegiance except to the land from which it originally came, then we may as well make up our minds that the great experiment of democratic government on this continent will have failed. No less will it have failed if each section thinks only of the welfare of that section, and with crass blindness believes that disaster to some other section will not affect it. And the failure will be the greatest of all if foolish men are persuaded by wicked men that one caste or class is the prime enemy of some other class or caste. I appeal to the men of the East to prepare so that the men of the Pacific slope shall be free from all menace of danger. I appeal to the men of the West to prepare so that the men of the Atlantic coast shall be free from all danger. I appeal to the North, South, West, and East alike to hold the life of every man and the honor of every woman on the most remote ranch on the Mexican border as a sacred trust to be guaranteed by the might of our entire Nation—and the life of every man, woman, and child who should be protected by the United States on the high seas likewise. I appeal to every good American, whether farmer or merchant, business man or professional man, whether he works with brain or hand. Anything of disgrace or dishonor that befalls our people anywhere is of vital moment to all of us wherever we live; and any deed that reflects credit on the American name is a subject of congratulation for every American of every section of this country.

"I speak of the United States as a whole. Surely it ought to be unnecessary to say that it spells as absolute ruin to permit divisions among our people along the lines of creed or of national origin as it does to permit division by geographical section. We must not stand merely for America first. We must stand for America first and last; and for no other nation second—except as we stand for fair play for all nations. There can be no divided loyalty in this country. The man who tries to be loyal to this country and also to some other country is certain in the end to put his loyalty to the other country ahead of his loyalty to this. The politico-racial hyphen is the breeder of moral treason. We are a new nation, by blood akin to but different from all the nations of Europe. In the veins of our people runs the blood of German, Englishman, and Irishman, of Scandinavian, Slav, and Latin. Any one of these people can bring something of value to our common national life. Each can contribute social and cultural traditions and customs of value; and all must join in cordial mutuality of respect for whatever is valuable that each brings; but each must put the contribution at the service of our common and unified citizenship, and by utilizing all that is thus contributed, and by adapting and developing it so that it shall meet and express our common needs, we shall build our own distinctive national culture. * * *

"No form of government will survive unless it can justify its existence. Boasting about democracy won't make democracy succeed. We are the greatest democratic Republic and we are false not only to our own country but to democracy everywhere if we do not seriously endeavor to show, by our actions and success, that with us the many men can make a nation as efficient as elsewhere nations have been made efficient by a few men. We must make America efficient within its own borders, efficient to repel attack from beyond its own borders, and yet a friend and not a menace to other peoples. We must make ourselves serviceable to democracy, to the cause of popular rights and popular duties in national and also in international matters. A happy-go-lucky belief that we can become serviceable by combining sentimental speeches with selfish actions will bring us to futility. Serviceableness comes only through preparedness, and both the training and the service—through economic, social, and military efficiency—imply courage, sustained effort, clear vision, and the power for self-sacrifice.

"I speak for military preparedness. I speak for industrial preparedness. I speak for the performance of international duty, which can only come when we fit ourselves to do our duty to ourselves, and when we have made up our minds never to make a promise to any other nation which can not be kept, which ought not to be kept, and which will not be kept. I speak of all this in the interest of national unity and manhood, of international peace, and of the service of our country and of the world at large. It is our duty to secure justice and well-being at home; but we live in a fool's paradise if we think that we shall be permitted to secure such justice and well-being, as the world now is, unless we are prepared to hold our own against all alien enemies. I appeal to the men of the West; I appeal to Americans everywhere to stand against the crass materialism which can show itself just as much in peace as in war. I appeal to our people to prepare in advance so that there shall be no hideous emergency which renders it necessary to submit to inordinate profit making by the few simply because, when the emergency comes, we must improvise at whatever cost the things that for our sins we have failed to provide beforehand. We can not afford to leave this democracy of ours inefficient. If we do it will assuredly some day go down in ruin. We can not afford to tolerate with cynical indifference the pork-barrel theories of government so dear to the hearts of politicians of the baser sort. With a wealth of billions of dollars, and a population of 100,000,000, we can not afford to be in a condition of utterly unstable social and industrial equilibrium, nor to see our sons grow up steeped in a spirit of mere selfish individualism, without self-control or discipline or sense of cooperation, or firmness of purpose. We have great individual capacity. This we must keep. But we must train it so that we shall have great collective capacity, so that there may be that collective democratic power and discipline without which no great modern democracy can permanently subsist.

"We must not only do away with sectionalism, but we must see that our land really is a melting pot of citizenship and that all peoples who come here become Americans and nothing else. We have equally to dread the sleek, well-fed materialist whose be-all and end-all in life are ease and comfort; and the base, selfish man who thinks only of his individual aggrandizement; and the foolish, boastful, wordy, sentimentalist who with amazing ignorance fancies that Americans armed only with words can successfully oppose strong and brutal men with rifles.

"Our national character is in the balance. Americanism is on trial. If we produce merely the self-seeking, ease-loving, duty-shirking man, whether he be a mere materialist or a mere silly sentimentalist; if we produce only the Americanism of the grafter and the mollycoddle and the safety-first, get-rich-quick, peace-at-any-price man, we will have produced an American faithful only to the spirit of the Tories of 1776 and the Copperheads of 1861, and fit only to vanish from the earth."

[From newer Roosevelt messages on "Fear God and take your own part," June, 1917.]

"Peace is not the end. Righteousness is the end. When the Savior saw the money changers in the temple He broke the peace by driving them out. At that moment peace could have been obtained readily enough by the simple process of keeping quiet in the presence of wrong. But instead of preserving peace at the expense of righteousness, the Savior armed Himself with a scourge of cords and drove the money changers from the temple. Righteousness is the end, and peace a means to the end, and sometimes it is not peace, but war which is the proper means to achieve the end. Righteousness should breed valor and strength. When it does breed them, it is triumphant; and when triumphant, it necessarily brings peace. But peace does not necessarily bring righteousness. * * *

"Let this Nation fear God and take its own part. Let it scorn to do wrong to great or small. Let it exercise patience and charity toward all other peoples, and yet at whatever cost unflinchingly stand for the right when the right is menaced by the might which backs wrong. Let it furthermore remember that the only way in which successfully to oppose wrong which is backed by might is to put over against it right which is backed by might. Wanton or unjust war is an abhorrent evil. But there are even worse evils. Until, as a Nation, we learn to put honor and duty above safety, and to encounter any hazard with stern joy rather than fail in our obligations to ourselves and others, it is mere folly to talk of entering into leagues for world peace or into any other movement of like character. The only kind of peace worth having is the peace of righteousness and justice; the only nation that can serve other nations is the strong and valiant nation; and the only great international policies worth considering are those whose upholders believe in them strongly enough to fight for them. The Monroe doctrine is as strong as the United States Navy, and no stronger. A nation is utterly contemptible if it will not fight in its own defense. A nation is not wholly admirable unless in time of stress it will go to war for a great ideal wholly unconnected with its immediate material interest.

"Let us prepare not merely in military matters, but in our social and industrial life. There can be no sound relationship toward other nations unless there is also sound relationship among our own citizens within our own ranks. Let us insist on the thorough Americanization of the newcomers to our shores, and let us also insist on the thorough Americanization of ourselves. Let us encourage the fullest industrial activity, and give the amplest industrial reward to those whose activities are most important for securing industrial success, and at the same time let us see that justice is done and wisdom shown in securing the welfare of every man, woman, and child within our borders. Finally, let us remember that we can do nothing to help other peoples, and nothing permanently to secure material well-being and social justice within our own borders, unless we feel with all our hearts devotion to this country, unless we are Americans and nothing else, and unless in time of peace by universal military training, by insistence upon the obligations of every man and every woman to serve the Commonwealth both in peace and war, and, above all, by a high and fine preparedness of soul and spirit we fit ourselves to hold our own against all possible aggression from without.

"We are the citizens of a mighty Republic consecrated to the service of God above, through the service of man on this earth. We are the heirs of a great heritage bequeathed to us by statesmen who saw with the eyes of the seer and the prophet. We must not prove false to the memories of the Nation's past. We must not prove false to the fathers from whose loins we sprang, and to their fathers, the stern men who dared greatly and risked all things that freedom should hold aloft an undimmed torch in this wide land. They held their worldly well-being as dust in the balance then weighed against their sense of high duty, their fealty to lofty ideals. Let us show ourselves worthy to be their sons. Let us care, as is right for the things of the body; but let us show that we care even more for the things of the soul. Stout of heart, and pledged to the valor of righteousness, let us stand foursquare to the winds of destiny, from whatever corner of the world they blow. Let us keep untarnished, unstained, the honor of the flag our fathers bore aloft in the teeth of the wildest storm, the flag that shall float above the solid files of a united people, a people sworn to the great cause of liberty and of justice for themselves and for all the sons and daughters of men."

[From sayings of Theodore Roosevelt.]

"There is a homely old adage which runs: 'Speak softly and carry a big stick; you will go far.' If the American Nation will speak softly, and yet build, and keep at a pitch of the highest training a thoroughly efficient Navy, the Monroe doctrine will go far." (From addresses and messages.)

WHAT HE SAID IN EUROPE.

"The deadening effect on any race of the adoption of a logical and extreme socialistic system could not be overstated; it would spell sheer destruction; it would produce grosser wrong and outrage, fouler immorality, than any existing system. But this does not mean that we may not with great advantage adopt certain of the principles proposed by some given set of men who happen to call themselves Socialists; to be afraid to do so would be to make a mark of weakness on our part." (From the Sorbonne address, April 23, 1910.)

"If you think that the people of the United States want universal peace arbitration I suggest that you go to California and investigate conditions. I have no use for liars—national, international, or those found in private life." (From a speech in Arlington Cemetery, May 31, 1911.)

"During the last half of the nineteenth century the leaders of reaction in the United States, political and financial alike, gradually grew to recognize in the judiciary their most powerful potential ally. There was very little actual corruption on the bench; on the contrary, our judges have been, on the whole, both able and upright public servants, standing on a level probably higher than that of any other civil servants of the Government. But their whole training and the aloofness of their position on the bench prevent their having, as a rule, any real knowledge of, or understanding sympathy with, the lives and needs of the ordinary hard-working toiler." (From a speech at Santiago, Chile, November 22, 1913.)

"It seems to me that we should realize with the keenest gratitude how much we owe to the fact that by steady application of the Monroe doctrine this country has succeeded in preventing the colonization of this continent by the great military Old World powers. If it had not been for the existence of that doctrine and its support by this Government under Presidents of all shades of political belief, the great military nations of the Old World would unquestionably long ere this have possessed masses of territory in the Western Hemisphere. In such case nothing under heaven could have prevented our being involved in European struggles like the present. We would also in such case be under the crushing burden of immense armaments in time of peace, a burden the bearing of which has grown more enormous year by year in Europe. Well-meaning and amiable but shortsighted persons have from time to time protested against the Monroe doctrine and said it was outworn. I wish these good persons would seriously consider the present contest and realize that if it had not been for the Monroe doctrine in the past, and if the Monroe doctrine were at this moment abandoned, the United States would, in all probability, have been drawn into the present dreadful struggle." (From a speech at Hartford, Conn., August 15, 1914.)

"It is the country's duty to put itself into such shape that it will be able to defend its rights if they are invaded. I myself have seen the plans of at least two empires now involved in the war to capture our great cities and hold them for ransom because our standing Army is too weak to protect them. I have seen plans prepared deliberately to take both San Francisco and New York and hold them for ransom that would cripple our country and give funds to the enemy for carrying on the war." (From a speech a Tretnon, N. J., October 30, 1914.)

ROOSEVELT EXPOUNDS NEW NATIONALISM—SPEECH AT OSSAWATOMIE TAKEN BY MANY TO BE PLATFORM OF NEW PARTY—SOME SAY "SOCIALISM"—EX-PRESIDENT'S PRONOUNCEMENT DELIGHTS AUDIENCE OF 15,000 PERSONS AT JOHN BROWN BATTLE FIELD.

THE EX-PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. Roosevelt's speech follows:

"There have been two great crises in our country's history—first, when it was formed, and then again when it was perpetuated. The formative period included not merely the Revolutionary War, but the creation and adoption of the Constitution and the first dozen years of work under it. Then came 60 years during which we spread across the continent—years of vital growth, but of growth without rather than growth within.

"Then came the time of stress and strain, which culminated in the Civil War, the period of terrible struggle, upon the issue of which depended the justification of all that we had done earlier, and which marked the second great period of growth and development within. The name of John Brown will be forever associated with this second period of the Nation's history, and Kansas was the theater upon which the first act of the second of our great national life dramas was played. It was the result of the struggle in Kansas which determined that our country should be in deed as well as in name devoted to both union and freedom, that the great experiment of democratic government on a national scale should succeed and not fail.

"It was a heroic struggle and, as is inevitable with all such struggles, it had also a dark and terrible side. Very much was done of good and much also of evil; and, as was inevitable in such a period of revolution, often the same man did both good and evil. For our great good fortune as a Nation we, the people of the United States as a whole, can now afford to forget the evil, or at least to remember it without bitterness, and to fix our eyes with pride on the good that was accomplished.

"Even in ordinary times there are very few of us who do not see the problems of life as through a glass, darkly; and when the glass is clouded by the murk of furious popular passion the vision of the best and the bravest is dimmed. Looking back, we are all of us now able to do justice to the valor and the disinterestedness and the love of the right, as to each it was given to see the right, shown both by the men of the North and the men of the South in that contest which was finally decided by the attitude of the West.

"DEBT TO THE VETERANS.

"We can admire the heroic valor, the sincerity, the self-devotion shown alike by the men who wore the blue and the men who wore the gray; and our sadness that such men should have had to fight one another is tempered by the glad knowledge that ever hereafter their descendants shall be found fighting side by side, struggling in peace as well as in war for the uplift of their common country, all alike resolute to raise to the highest pitch of honor and usefulness the Nation to which they all belong. As for the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic, they deserve honor and recognition such as is paid to no other citizens of the Republic, for to them the Republic owes its all, for to them it owes its very existence.

"I do not speak of this struggle of the past merely from the historic standpoint. Our interest is primarily in the application to-day of the lessons taught by the contest of half a century ago. It is of little use for us to pay lip loyalty to the mighty men of the past unless we sincerely endeavor to apply to the problems of the present precisely the qualities which in other crises enabled the men of that day to meet those crises. It is half melancholy and half amusing to see the way in which well-meaning people gather to do honor to the men who, in company with John Brown, and under the lead of Abraham Lincoln, faced and solved the great problems of the nineteenth century, while at the same time these same good people nervously shrink from or frantically denounce those who are trying to meet the problems of the twentieth in the spirit which was accountable for the successful solution of the problems of Lincoln's time.

"Of that generation of men, to whom we owe so much, the man to whom we owe the most is, of course, Lincoln. Part of our debt to him is because he forecast our present struggle and saw the way out. He said:

"'I hold that while man exists it is his duty to improve not only his own condition, but to assist in ameliorating mankind.' And again, 'Labor is prior to and independent of capital; capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed but for labor. Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration. Capital has its rights which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. * * * Nor should this lead to a war upon the owners of property. Property is the fruit of labor; property is desirable; is a positive good in the world. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example showing that his own shall be safe from violence when built.'

"DESTROY SPECIAL PRIVILEGE.

"It seems to me that in these words Lincoln took substantially the attitude that we ought to take; he showed the proper sense of proportion in his relative estimates of capital and labor, of human rights and property rights. Above all in this speech, as in many others, he taught a lesson in wise kindliness and charity; an indispensable lesson to us of to-day. But this wise kindliness and charity never weakened his arm or numbed his heart. We can not afford weakly to blind ourselves to the actual conflict which faces us to-day. The issue is joined, and we must fight or fall.

"In every wise struggle for human betterment one of the main objects, and often the only object, has been to achieve in larger measure the quality of opportunity. In the struggle for this great end, nations rise from barbarism to civilization, and through it people press forward from one stage of enlightenment to the next. One of the chief factors in progress is the destruction of special privilege. The essence of any struggle for healthy liberty has always been and must always be to take from some one man or class of men the right to enjoy power, or wealth, or position, or immunity, which has not been earned by service to his or their fellows.

"Practical equality of opportunity for all citizens, when we achieve it, will have two great results. First, every man will have a fair chance to make of himself all that in him lies, to reach the highest point to which his capacities, unassisted by special privilege of his own and unhampered by the special privileges of others, can carry him, and to get for himself and his family substantially what he has earned. Second, equality of opportunity means that the Commonwealth will get from every citizen the highest service of which he is capable. No man who carries the burden of special privileges of another can give to the Commonwealth that service to which it is fairly entitled.

"I stand for the square deal. But when I say that I am for the square deal I mean not merely that I stand for fair play under the present rules of the game, but that I stand for having those rules changed so as to work for a more substantial equality of opportunity, and of reward for equally good service.

"This means that our Governments—National and State—must be freed from the sinister influence or control of special interests. Exactly as the special interests of cotton and slavery threatened our political integrity before the Civil War, so now the great special business interests too often control and corrupt the men and methods of government for their own profit. We must drive the special interests out of politics. That is one of our tasks to-day. Every special interest is entitled to justice—full, fair, and complete. Now, mind you, if there were any attempt by mob violence or in any other way to plunder and work harm to the special interests, whatever it may be that I most dislike, to the wealthy man, whomsoever he may be, for whom I have the greatest contempt, I would fight for him, and so would you, if you are worth your salt. He should have justice. Every special interest is entitled to justice. But not one is entitled to a vote in Congress, a voice on the bench, or to representation in any public office. The Constitution guarantees protection to property, and we must make that promise good. But it does not give the right of suffrage to any corporation.

"MUST CURB CORPORATIONS.

"There can be no effective control of corporations while their political activity remains. To put an end to it will be neither a short nor an easy task, but it can be done.

"We must have complete and effective publicity of corporate affairs, so that the people may know beyond peradventure whether the corporations obey the law and whether their management entitles them to the confidence of the public. It is necessary that laws should be passed to prohibit the use of corporate funds directly or indirectly for political purposes; it is still more necessary that such laws should be thoroughly enforced. Corporate expenditures for political purposes, and especially such expenditures by public-service corporations, have supplied one of the principal sources of corruption in our political affairs.

"It has become entirely clear that we must have Government supervision of the capitalization not only of public-service corporations, including particularly railways, but of all corporations doing an interstate business. I do not wish to see the Nation forced into ownership of the railways if it can possibly be avoided, and the only alternative is thoroughgoing and effective regulation, which shall be based on a full knowledge of all the facts, including a physical valuation of the property. This physical valuation is not needed, or at least is very rarely needed, for fixing rates; but it is needed as the basis of honest capitalization.

"We have come to recognize that franchises should never be granted except for a limited time, and never without proper provision for compensation to the public. It is my personal belief that the same kind and degree of control and supervision which should be exercised over public-service corporations should be extended also to combinations which control necessaries of life, such as meat, oil, and coal, or which deal in them on an important scale.

"I believe that the officers, and especially the directors, of corporations should be held personally responsible when corporations break the law.

"COMBINATIONS INEVITABLE.

"Combinations in industry are the result of an imperative economic law which can not be repealed by political legislation. The effort at prohibiting all combination has substantially failed. The only way out lies not in attempting to prevent such combinations, but in completely controlling them in the interest of the public welfare. For that purpose the Federal Bureau of Corporations is an agency of the first importance. Its power, and therefore its efficiency, as well as that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, should be largely increased. We should be as sure of the proper conduct of interstate railways and the proper management of interstate business as we are now sure of the conduct and management of the national banks.

"There is a widespread belief among our people that under the methods of making tariffs which have hitherto obtained the special interests are too influential. Probably this is true of both the big interests and the little interests. These methods have put a premium on selfishness, and naturally the selfish big interests have got more than the selfish small interests.

"The duty of Congress is to provide a method by which the interest of the whole people shall be all that receives consideration. To this end there must be an expert tariff commission, wholly removed from the possibility of political pressure or of improper business influence. Such a commission can find out the real difference between cost of production, which is mainly the difference of labor costs here and abroad. As fast as its recommendations are made I believe in revising one schedule at a time. A general revision of the tariff almost inevitably leads to logrolling, and the subordination of the general public interest to local and special interests.

"The absence of effective State and especially National restraint upon unfair money getting has tended to create a small class of enormously wealthy and economically powerful men, whose chief object is to hold and increase their power. The prime need is to change the conditions which enabled these men to accumulate power which it is not for the general welfare that they should hold or exercise. We grudge no man a fortune which represents his own power and sagacity, when exercised with entire regard to the welfare of his fellows. But the fortune must be honorably obtained and well used. It is not even enough that it should have been gained without doing damage to the community. We should permit it to be gained only so long as the gaining represents benefit to the community. This, I know, implies a policy of a far more active governmental interference with social and economic conditions in this country than we have yet had, but I think we have got to face the fact that such an increase in governmental control is now necessary.

"FAVORS AN INCOME TAX.

"No man should receive a dollar unless that dollar has been fairly earned. Every dollar received should represent a dollar's worth of service rendered. The really big fortune, the swollen fortune, by the mere fact of its size acquires qualities which differentiate it in kind as well as in degree from what is possessed by men of relatively small means. Therefore I believe in a graduated income tax on big fortunes and in another tax, which is far more easily collected and far more effective, a graduated inheritance tax on big fortunes, properly safeguarded against evasion and increasing rapidly in amount with the size of the estate.

"The people of the United States suffer from periodical financial panics to a degree substantially unknown among the other nations which approach us in financial strength. There is no reason why we should suffer what they escape. It is of profound importance that our financial system should be promptly investigated, and so thoroughly and effectively revised as to make it certain that hereafter our currency will no longer fail at critical times to meet our needs.

"It is hardly necessary for me to repeat that I believe in an efficient Army and a Navy large enough to secure for us abroad that respect which is the surest guaranty of peace. Justice and fair dealing among nations rest on principles identical with those which control justice and fair dealing among the individuals of which nations are composed, with the vital exception that each nation must do its own part in international police work. National friendships, like those between men, must be founded on respect as well as on liking, on forbearance as well as upon trust. In all this it is peculiarly the duty of the United States to set a good example.

"I have spoken elsewhere of the great task which lies before the farmers of the country to get for themselves and for their wives and children not only the benefits of better farming, but also those of better business methods and better conditions of life on the farm. The burden of this great task will fall, as it should, mainly upon the great organizations of the farmers themselves. I am glad it will, for I believe they are well able to handle it.

"In particular, there are strong reasons why the departments of agriculture of the various States, the United States Department of Agriculture, and the agricultural colleges and experiment stations should extend their work to cover all phases of life on the farm, instead of limiting themselves, as they have far too often limited themselves in the past, solely to the question of the production of crops.

"THE REGULATION OF WEALTH.

"Nothing is more true than that excess of every kind is followed by reaction; a fact which should be pondered by reformer and reactionary alike. We are face to face with new conceptions of the relations of property to human welfare, chiefly because certain advocates of the rights of property as against the rights of men have been pushing their claims too far. The man who wrongly holds that every human right is secondary to his profit must now give way to the advocate of human welfare, who rightfully maintains that every man holds his property subject to the general right of the community to regulate its use to whatever degree the public welfare may require it.

"But I think we may go still further. The right to regulate the use of wealth in the public interest is universally admitted. Let us admit also the right to regulate the terms and conditions of labor, which is the chief element of wealth, directly in the interest of the common good. The fundamental thing to do for every man is to give him the chance to reach a place in which he will make the greatest possible contribution to the public welfare. No man can be a good citizen unless he has a wage more than sufficient to cover the bare cost of living, and hours of labor short enough so that after his day's work is done he will have time and energy to bear his share in the management of the community to help in carrying the general load.

"We keep countless men from being good citizens by the conditions of life with which we surround them. We need comprehensive workmen's compensation acts, both State and National laws to regulate child labor and the work of women, and especially we need in our common schools not merely education in book learning, but also practical training for daily life and work. We need to enforce better sanitary conditions for our workers and to extend the use of safety appliances in industry and commerce, both within and between the States.

"Also, friends, in the interest of the workingman himself we need to set our faces like flint against mob violence just as against corporate greed; against violence and injustice and lawlessness by wage workers just as much as against lawless cunning and greed and selfish arrogance of employers.

"I do not ask for overcentralization, but I do ask that we work in a spirit of broad and far-reaching nationalism when we work for what concerns our people as a whole. We are all Americans. Our common interests are as broad as the continent. I speak to you here in Kansas exactly as I would speak in New York or Georgia, for the most vital problems are those which affect us all alike.

"The National Government belongs to the whole American people, and where the whole American people are interested that interest can be guarded effectively only by the National Government. The betterment which we seek must be accomplished, I believe, mainly through the National Government.

"NATIONALISM DEMANDED.

"The American people are right in demanding that new nationalism without which we can not hope to deal with new problems. The new nationalism puts the national need before sectional or personal advantage. It is impatient of the utter confusion that results from local legislatures attempting to treat national issues as local issues. It is still more impatient of the impotence which springs from the overdivision of Government powers, the impotence which makes it possible for local selfishness or for legal cunning, hired by wealthy special interests, to bring national activities to a deadlock. This new nationalism regards the executive power as the steward of the public welfare. It demands of the judiciary that it shall be interested primarily in human welfare rather than in property, just as it demands that the representative body shall represent all the people rather than any one class or section of the people.

"I believe in shaping the ends of government to protect property as well as human welfare. Normally, and in the long run, the ends are the same, but whenever the alternative must be faced I am for men and not for property.

"NEED OF DIRECT PRIMARY.

"If our political institutions were perfect, they would absolutely prevent the political domination of money in any part of our affairs. We need to make our political representatives more quickly and sensitively responsive to the people whose servants they are. More direct action by the people in their own affairs under proper safeguards is vitally necessary.

"The direct primary is a step in this direction if it is associated with a corrupt-practices act effective enough to prevent the advantage of the man willing recklessly and unscrupulously to spend money over his more honest competitor.

"It is particularly important that all moneys received or expended for campaign purposes should be publicly accounted for, not only after election but before election as well. Political action must be made simpler, easier, and freer from confusion for every citizen. I believe that the prompt removal of unfaithful or incompetent public servants should be made easy and sure in whatever way experience shall show to be most expedient in any given class of cases.

"One of the fundamental necessities in a representative government such as ours is to make certain that the men to whom the people delegate their power shall serve the people by whom they are elected, and not the special interests. I believe that every national officer, elected or appointed, should be forbidden to perform any service or receive any compensation directly or indirectly from interstate corporations, and a similar provision should not fail to be useful within the States.

"The object of government is the welfare of the people. The material progress and prosperity of a nation are desirable chiefly so far as they lead to the moral and material welfare of all good citizens. Just in proportion as the average man and woman are honest, capable of sound judgment and high ideals, active in public affairs—but first of all sound in their home life, and the father and mother of healthy children—just so far and no further we may count our civilization a success.

"We must have—I believe we have already—a genuine and permanent moral awakening, without which no wisdom of legislation or administration really means anything; and, on the other hand, we must try to secure the social and economic legislation without which any improvement due to purely moral agitation is necessarily evanescent. The prime problem of our Nation is to get the right type of good citizenship; and to get it we must have progress and all our people must be genuinely progressive."

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

As in legislative session,

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, earlier in the day I sought to secure unanimous consent to introduce a report from the Committee on Education and Labor on the Americanization bill. I did it largely because of the sentiment of the day, as expressed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], and because of the well-known desire of the former President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, for some kind of a plan of Americanization.

This bill is reported by the Committee on Education and Labor unanimously, as a substitute for a number of bills pending before that committee on this subject. It seeks to deal with one of the most serious questions in our American life, illiteracy, and foreign-born aliens; and the problem as presented by this bill is to give every American resident and also alien a chance to learn the American language—I prefer to use the term "American language" instead of the term "English language," because it is the American language—and to make foreigners learn it if they desire to remain in this country; in other words, to Americanize America.

Mr. President, there are over 8,000,000 people in this country over 10 years of age who can neither read, write, nor speak the English language, and at least 55 per cent of them are native born. That is certainly a problem that challenges the attention of the American people.

Mr. WATSON. How many did the Senator say?

Mr. KENYON. Over 8,000,000.

Mr. Herbert Kaufman has been an assistant to Secretary Lane in this work for the last year, giving up his own business and serving the Government without price in order to formulate an organization which now is ready to act on this great proposition all over this country. Mr. Kaufman is entitled to the thanks of all lovers of America.

Mr. WARREN. What does the Senator name as the percentage of foreigners born in this country who could not read or write?

Mr. KENYON. I put it conservatively at least 55 per cent of the total number.

Mr. WARREN. Are those young children, who will yet be educated?

Mr. KENYON. No; above 10 years of age. The figure of 8,000,000 is of those above 10 years of age.

Mr. WARREN. I can hardly conceive that to be in this country of schools. Perhaps the Senator will elucidate it further along.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator had been with the committee in the Pittsburgh district and out among the mills, he would have been astounded, I think, at the facts which came to the attention of the committee.

In the town of Clarenton, where 150 men were gathered around Senator McKELLAR and myself, through interpreters we got the word that we wanted to get to them, and asked all of those who were American citizens to raise their hands. There were only three among the 150. A good many of them could speak the English language, but many of them could not.

Mr. WARREN. Those were adults?

Mr. KENYON. All adults. I wish an article written by Mr. Herbert Kaufman in the New York Tribune something over a week ago could be made into a public document. It is a wonderful article. It challenges the attention of the Nation to this problem. I read here and there from it. He says:

> Discontent is mumbling and violence is ranting on all sides. America is on trial before 10,000 soap boxes; chaos is everywhere seeking recruits from the ranks of misunderstanding and illiteracy.

Again he says:

> Illiteracy is a pick-and-shovel estate, a life sentence to meniality. Democracy may not have fixed classes and survive.

Again:

> An outbreak of hoof and mouth disease would compel instant remedial laws and funds to contain the menace within bounds. It is even more incumbent upon us to defend healthy citizenship against civic incapables.

And again:

> If a hundred million of us stand together, we must think together and that without foreign accent.

Mr. President, if the illiterates and the foreign born who can not speak our language should be reviewed from a stand in front of the White House, marching by two abreast, and marching 25 miles a day, it would take two months of solid marching for them to pass the reviewing stand.

Early in the war Mr. Samuel Gompers predicted, quoting his language:

> An even greater misunderstanding between Government and labor than that which arose in England may arise in a more acute form because of the racial diversity of our working classes.

That prophecy seems about to be fulfilled.

Secretary Lane has said:

> An uninformed democracy is not a democracy.

These startling facts will be presented to the Senate in due time. The purpose of this bill is to give these illiterates and give these aliens a chance to learn the American language and to become good Americans, and after having had that chance, if they will not do it, then the aliens ought to be compelled to leave this country.

Mr. President, this is the birthday of the man who was our supreme American. With him America—its thoughts, its purposes, its ideals—was a supreme passion. Never faltered he in devotion to his country. It is appropriate that an Americanization bill start on its journey through the Congress upon the birthday of this man, for every purpose, thought, action, inspiration of his life was for a greater, a better, and a more American America.

The old ship of state in this hour is floating on troublesome seas. Whitecaps of anarchy are battling its voyage, but—

> We know what Master laid thy keel,
> What Workman wrought thy ribs of steel.

So we fear not the sudden sound and shock. We know the old ship will safely weather the storm—

> In spite of rock and tempest roar,
> In spite of false lights on the shore.

There are misguided men in American to-day—thousands, and even millions, of them. They are to be pitied. They do not know the purposes of America, for they have had no opportunity to learn. They do not know that this is in fact the land of the poor boy; that men have given their lives that the doors of opportunity might ever be open to the children of to-morrow; that the opportunities for their children are the best of any nation of earth. Our country is to blame because the chance has not been presented for them to know. Many of them are eager to know America for themselves and for their children. If they can not read or speak or understand the American language, how can they know the wonderful stories of opportunity in this country? How can they understand the heights to which their children may attain in this land of freedom? To them the story of the humble, poor boy's pathway from the log cabin of Kentucky to the Presidency of the United States, the inspiration of the towpath followed by Garfield, the struggles of Theodore Roosevelt, the advancement to the Presidency of Woodrow Wilson from the humble Presbyterian parsonage are closed books. While they are in the Nation, they know not of the Nation. There would be no menace to the future of America from these men if they really knew what America meant. Boys of foreign birth have gone out to fight for the Nation just as loyally as those who were born in this country. The long rolls of honor of those who have been left on the fields of France contain the names of nearly every nationality on earth. There is good material here for Americanization. The melting pot can not boil unless there is fuel under it, and that fuel is education. The purpose of this bill is to help furnish the fuel for the great American melting pot. And out of it will come those who now are toiling mentally in the ignorance and superstition of past ages into the glorious sunlight of American intelligence. Is such a work worth while? Long may be the road, but it is time to start. There should be a rallying to the proposition of Americanization on the part of States, municipalities, governments, societies, and individuals, and I predict there will be such rallying and a tremendous wave of patriotism sweep this bill on to final success.

There are other spirits in this country trying to lead these deluded mortals—the spirits of darkness—determined to overthrow the best government that ever has existed under the sun, but they mistake the spirit and purpose of America also. America will not hesitate to deal with them with an iron hand; America will not tolerate anarchy. But America must awaken to the dangers and America must not falter or equivocate. An awakened nation of over 100,000,000 people does not propose that a few hundred thousand anarchists and Bolshevists shall overthrow this nation of hope and this land of opportunity.

Americanization will not only mean getting rid of these impossible characters and bringing the light of intelligence to some of their blind followers, but Americanization will mean the development of more brotherly feeling, help to make impossible contests of capital and labor. The teaching of the American language is only a step in the plan of Americanization.

The man who cares for his fellow man only as he can use him as he would a piece of iron or coal, to increase his dividends, needs Americanization. He loves himself better than his country, and the problem of Americanization is to instill into the hearts of our people a love of their country above a love of themselves; it is time for every American to search his own heart and honestly ask himself what sacrifices he is making for this country and how much of self he is willing to give up for the good of his country. Give every resident alien a chance to become an American. Some of them have not had it. Give them the opportunity to be good citizens. Let them know that the great Republic is builded on the rock of justice. If they will not become good Americans, let them get out of the country. Let the anarchist understand that his doctrines have no more effect upon the structure of this Government than the waves lapping the rock of Gibraltar. But let him know that if he desires to advance those doctrines he will have to seek other shores. America is no place for him. Let him know that there is but one flag in this country, the Stars and Stripes, and there is no place for the red flag of anarchy.

It is no time to be pessimistic in all the turmoil through which we are passing. It is time to follow the doctrine of the beautiful Psalm of David:

> I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help.

Upon the hills of America shines the vision of national perpetuity.

A nation that can produce a Theodore Roosevelt ought never to waver, be pessimistic, or cowardly. Never have we needed his spirit as we need it to-day. The spirit of Roosevelt is a conquering spirit over wrong, injustice, oppression, disloyalty. The spirit of Roosevelt makes for a courageous brotherhood of man, recognizing the rights and relationships of men to one another. That brotherhood shall yet conquer all the enemies of the Republic—a brotherhood that is kind, but that can be stern; a brotherhood that rallies to the call of America, ready to do or die for the Republic.

America! America! God shed His grace on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood from sea to shining sea.

The last public words of Roosevelt were a call for Americanization. He said:

I can not be with you, and so all I can do is to wish you Godspeed. There must be no sagging back in the fight for Americanism merely because the war is over. There are plenty of persons who have already made the assertion that they believe the American people have a short memory and that they intend to revive all the foreign associations which most directly interfere with the complete Americanization of our people. Our principle in this matter should be absolutely simple. In the first place, we should insist that if the immigrant who comes here does in good faith become an American and assimilates himself to us he shall be treated on an exact equality with everyone else, for it is an outrage to discriminate against any such man because of creed or birthplace or origin.

But this is predicated upon the man's becoming in very fact an American, and nothing but an American. If he tries to keep segregated with men of his own origin and separated from the rest of America, then he isn't doing his part as an American. There can be no divided allegiance here. Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all.

We have room for but one flag, the American flag, and this excludes the red flag, which symbolizes all wars against liberty and civilization, just as much as it excludes any foreign flag of a nation to which we are hostile. We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house; and we have room for but one soul loyalty, and that is loyalty to the American people.

Faithfully, yours, T. ROOSEVELT.

God grant that the spirit of Theodore Roosevelt may inspire the citizenship of the great Republic in this hour of stress to be firm, yet just, and to make any sacrifice needed to maintain this as a government where law, order, and justice shall prevail.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to present the report of the Committee on Education and Labor with the bill as agreed upon by that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent, as in legislative session, to present the report of the Committee on Education and Labor. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will be received.

The bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar and the report (Rept. No. 276) will be printed under the rule.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I wish to express in a very few words the attitude that I entertain toward the pending amendment.

I will vote for the pending amendment giving the United States mutual equality with Great Britain in the league of nations because it gives me the opportunity to express my conviction that my country is as great and as good and is as much to be considered and reckoned with as any upon this earth if it is to be drawn into the maelstrom of world politics.

I will vote for the amendment because it gives me the opportunity to express my protest against Great Britain's willingness to assert for the British Empire a preponderance of influence in the counsels of the world as against the United States—a preponderance of 6 to 1 for the English-speaking peoples of British allegiance as against the English-speaking peoples of American allegiance, who are the more numerous of the two in the world, in the ratio, I suppose, of something like 10 to 7.

For the other branch of the English-speaking peoples to offer us, with a population of 10 to their 7, 1 vote to their 6 upon questions wherein they and we may be of different opinion is not calculated to foster salutary understanding between the heirs of Magna Charta and of a rich, common inheritance of law, language, and freedom. It is not by the assertion, but by the disavowal, of any such claim in case of difference of view between the Empire, or a part of the Empire, and the Republic, that the British Empire might advance good understanding with the American Nation.

In 1870 Great Britain failed to make the same sacrifices to check the growth of the German menace that we made in 1917. If in 1870 Britain had gone to the relief of France as we went to the relief of France and England in 1917, Bismarck's ambitions would have been thwarted and the German Empire would not have been created at Versailles, where 50 years later it was destroyed by the throwing of the weight of America's arms and resources into the scale against it.

If America is to be penalized for going to the rescue in 1917—and to the rescue of the British as well as the French—what should have been the punishment of Britain for failing to do so in 1870? We did go to the rescue. I am proud that we did so for the right, and without the spur or the chain of entente or alliance or league. As I have said before, I believe we shall always do so in a world crisis, and without the need of any agreement or league whatsoever on the subject; and, as I have said before, I should favor a broad American doctrine in such sense. But I should expect in return generous consideration from the nations with which we should be expected to cooperate—very generous consideration, not 6 to 1 consideration.

I am unwilling to submit to the slightest implication or appearance of implication of inferiority or of inequality of voice between the divisions of the English-speaking people in questions upon which they may hold differing views. I shall be content with no face-saving device to give assurance that after all this inequality that may be asserted in the opposed vote of the two peoples amounts to but little.

I will vote for this amendment as an expression of my willingness to do directly, if need be, what it is proposed to do indirectly by reservations. I shall not be diverted from my purpose to vote for this amendment by the fallacious argument that to adopt it will send the treaty back to the peace conference and entail delay in bringing peace to the world.

The proponents of the league have talked so much about the necessity for the coming into force of this treaty, our relationship to such a situation, and the need for reconvening the peace conference in case the Senate does not obey the behest of the Executive and approve the ratification of this treaty without any change whatsoever, that a brief discussion of that proposition may be timely.

I have already in previous addresses called attention to the last clause of the preamble of the treaty of Versailles, which reads:

From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this treaty official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the allied and associated powers.

I have also noted that the later clauses of the last clause of the treaty provide:

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

In all other respects—and, Mr. President, I call particular attention to those words—in all other respects the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

In the earlier stages of the discussion of this treaty the proponents of the league sought to lead the public to believe that the only way in which the status of war between ourselves and Germany could be terminated would be through our ratification of this treaty. They have, however, abandoned that position and now seemingly agree with those who are standing for ratification with changes in the contention that the status of hostilities between ourselves and Germany will terminate so soon as any three of the principal allied and associated powers have been deposited in Paris.

Driven thus from the position that we must ratify in order to get peace, they are now seeking to intrench themselves behind the argument that unless we ratify this treaty as it is drawn a reconvening of the peace conference is inevitable, with all the tedium, delay, and dangers attendant upon new negotiations.

So much is made of this argument that it is worth while carefully to trace to its end the exact situation which would arise in case we shall ratify this treaty with the fundamental and far-reaching reservations and amendments which have been proposed.

We must start with the fact always to be kept in mind and to which, seemingly, all are now agreed, that hostilities with Germany will terminate for all the world so soon as the treaty is ratified by Germany and three of the principal allied and associated powers.

As showing how fully it is designed that the deposit of the first procès verbal shall terminate hostilities, I shall refer to a few of the matters which are to take place within the time calculated from the date this first deposit is made and which go forward and are concluded under the treaty, and inevitably so, without any reference to further ratification by powers other than the three first ratifying powers. As will be apparent, most of these things I list not only contemplate the termination of the state of war against Germany but they would be difficult, if not impossible, of fulfillment if there were between Germany and any other power even a legal status of war without any hostilities being actually conducted.

German troops and authorities are to be withdrawn from prescribed portions of east Prussia and from certain prescribed areas near the Nogat and the Vistula within 15 days from the coming into force of the present treaty, and within 10 days from the same date German troops and likewise workmen's and soldiers' councils are to retire from Schleswig. Furthermore, German military forces are to be demobilized and German armament, munitions, and materials are to be reduced to specified limits within two months from the coming into force of the treaty. The naval forces and personnel of the German Navy are to be reduced to a specified size within the same period. Within three months from the coming into force of the treaty certain named war-material manufactories are to be closed down and fortifications named are to be dismantled. The ownership of German surface warships not in German ports is renounced by Germany from the date of the coming into force of the treaty, and certain named warships are to be surrendered within two months of that date. German warships now under construction are to be broken up upon the coming into force of the treaty, and German submarines, docks, and salvaged vessels are to be surrendered at the expiration of one month from that time. Germany is to mine sweep, beginning with the date when the treaty comes into force, certain named areas. On the same date she is to surrender all military and naval aeronautical materials beyond amounts specified, and may not for a period of six months from the coming into force of the treaty import any aircraft materials.

The repatriation of prisoners of war and interned civilians takes place as soon as possible after the treaty comes into force. From the same date Germany may not send or accredit military or naval attachés to other governments and must prevent the enrollment of Germans in armies and navies of other powers. At the expiration of two months after the treaty comes into force stringent restrictions are made operative as to German military schools and other educational and like institutions.

The commissions for delimiting the boundaries of the free city of Danzig, for determining the boundary of the Saar Basin and of Schleswig, are to be appointed within 15 days from the date the treaty comes into force, and from the nature of their duties it is evident that the interallied commissions of control and the great reparation commission must be appointed at once. And so of other commissions I need not pause to name.

The citizenship of Alsace-Lorrainers will be settled within one year from the coming into force of the treaty and the citizenship of Germans in Poland within two years. German nationals ordinarily resident in the free city of Danzig lose their German nationality immediately upon the coming into force of this treaty, and German residents in adjacent territories have two years from that time to elect their citizenship.

As to treaties, certain designated treaties touching China are applicable from the coming into force of the treaty; designated articles of this treaty itself are operative merely for certain named periods beginning from the same date; certain enumerated multilateral treaties only are to be effective as between the powers and Germany from the coming into force of the treaty; and the allied and associated powers are to have advantage of certain other clauses of German treaties from the same date.

Without delay from the coming into force of the present treaty Germany undertakes to restore all articles, money, securities, and documents which have belonged to nationals of the allied and associated powers and which have been retained by German authorities, and all private securities of the allied and associated powers held in Germany must be delivered to such powers within six months from the coming into force of the present treaty.

Certain gold deposits in Germany are to be turned over to the principal allied and associated powers within one month from the coming into force of the treaty.

From the date of the coming into force of the treaty all the deposits of coal situated within the Saar Basin become the complete and absolute property of the French State. From the same date and for a period of 10 years German electrical supply works must furnish service to any establishment the working of which passes under this treaty permanently or temporarily to France.

Goods of specified origin are to be imported into Germany free from duty for specific periods, beginning on the date of the coming into force of the treaty; likewise goods have most-favored-nation treatment for periods beginning at the same date.

Property rights and interests claimed by the allied or associated powers against Germany on account of property located and dealt with in Germany must be satisfied, and industrial property rights are to be vindicated within one year from the coming into force of the treaty. Lastly, and almost primarily significant, German laws are to be harmonized with the provisions of this treaty within a period of three months from the same date.

Many of these matters are vital as affecting the very life and substance of the treaty itself; they will all become operative as against Germany upon the ratification of this treaty by any three of the great powers no matter what our action on the matter may be. For the language of the treaty is that * * * "from the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it." That is, the treaty as it is written and ratified is operative as between the powers so ratifying wholly irrespective of the action which may be taken by any other power. The balance of the powers may ratify or not ratify; they may ratify unreservedly or with reservations; but whatever their action, it can have no effect whatever upon the treaty or its provisions as between and among Germany on the one hand and the three ratifying powers on the other. As to them the treaty stands as it is written.

Considering the great number of powers signatory to the treaty and their divers interests therein, it was indispensable that a provision of this kind should be in the treaty in order that some power, seeking purely for further selfish ends, might not postpone peace to the world until the end sought was reached, to the consequent economic, social, and moral detriment of the whole world. Furthermore, if Germany is to meet the terms of the treaty as written she must enjoy profound peace within her borders. She can not carry on a war with any power with the resulting disarrangement of her industries and finances, which must all be brought to bear upon war indemnities. Moreover, a glance at the map will show that no power could engage in a war with Germany without threatening the peace of some other power, and in most cases a war would not be possible, except the belligerent power used the territory of a third power as a base from which to make an attack on Germany. This is conspicuously true in our own case. For we could hardly conduct a successful war against Germany save by continuing our stay in France, who obviously will not want us carrying on hostilities from her territories while she herself is at peace and desiring the German indemnity which peace alone can bring. Nor would she want the internal disarrangement which would come to her from such an enterprise on our part.

Therefore, when this treaty comes into force, through ratification by Germany and three allied and associated powers, it stands as between those ratifying powers in the precise form in which written.

The treaty furthermore provides that "in all other respects"—that is, all respects other than the termination of hostilities, and the resumption of official relations with Germany, and the determination of periods of time provided for in the treaty—"the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratifications." Under this provision, if any power desires to secure the benefits other than the termination of hostilities and the resumption of official relations, conferred upon that power by this treaty, it must ratify the treaty in order to secure them.

But if any power to which advantage is to flow from this treaty desires to augment or alter those benefits, it would probably be necessary for such a power to gain the consent of all powers signatory to the treaty, and this action, whatever form it might take, would be virtually a new peace conference. But I ask what signatory power is there which could sanely entertain the slightest hope that a reconsideration of its claims as recognized in this treaty would result in augmenting them? The action of the French Chamber of Deputies is fairly indicative that France is convinced the treaty contains her maximum of advantage, and so of Great Britain; and even Italy, who has her Fiume difficulties, seems willing if not anxious to accept immediately what this treaty gives her. As for Japan, I have not heard that she was denied anything substantial for which she asked at the conference, and therefore it is not to be expected that she will decline ratification in order again to go to a peace table where our representative, if we sit at the table, would be already aware of the strength of opinion in this country against certain of the benefits granted to Japan by the present treaty.

So far as the smaller powers are concerned, those immediately concerned—Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State—all owe their existence in whole or in part to this treaty; and it is scarcely to be thought that they would jeopardize their very existence by inviting a new peace conference. Belgium asked for and deserved more than she got, yet I am sure that the wisdom of her statesmen would not care to subject her to the uncertainties of a new conference.

Thus it is difficult to see how any of the powers could hope to gain further advantages from a reconvening of the peace conference, and the most if not all of them would scarcely wish to jeopardize what they already have to the monumental uncertainties of a new negotiation.

But we are not among those who get benefits from the treaty; burdens are our sole treaty heritage. Moreover, these burdens we must believe were self-imposed, because it can not be that we found ourselves under the compulsion of our allies in these matters. We sat at the peace table as associated victors, not as cobelligerent vanquished. Moreover, there is no single burden or collection of burdens imposed upon us by this treaty which, if we disavow them, will in any way affect a due carrying out of the provisions of the document, save only in this one respect, that the treaty will lack the pledge, and the obligation inevitably flowing from our full participation, that we use our full military and material resources for the enforcement of the treaty provisions in their infinity of detail.

So that it is idle to speak of the necessity of reconvening the peace conference and blindly optimistic to speak of the possibility of doing so. Once this treaty is ratified by three of the great powers there will be no new negotiations, and I assure you it will be so ratified if our diplomacy shall not continue successfully to thrust itself into world politics, with a view to forcing this Senate willy-nilly to bow to an Executive fiat to advise and consent to the ratification of this treaty without amendment. And I doubt whether even our suave and herculean colonel could for long impede the aspirations or ambitions of our European allies. And why, sir, should the powers which have ratified and are satisfied with the treaty reconvene in conference and open up the whole negotiations merely to arrange for us to throw off our self-imposed obligations? For as to us, the prime if not the only thing over which the great powers are anxious is the power to command the assistance of our military and naval forces in case of difficulties in Europe, and since we are under no compulsion from them to render such assistance outside the undertakings we make in this treaty, it is self-evident that they will gladly accept whatever amount of such promises and undertakings we in our wisdom or unwisdom may see fit to assume. It is the veriest nonsense for us under these circumstances to speak of the necessity of reconvening the peace conference and reopening its negotiations merely to note that we are to curtail the voluntary and self-imposed obligations under the treaty which our negotiators ill-advisedly thought we would be willing to assume.

Inasmuch as the ratification of this treaty by three of the principal allied and associated powers and Germany brings a full peace status between Germany and the whole opposing world—and of this there can be no doubt, because the treaty distinctly says that "from that moment"—the coming into force of the treaty—"and subject to the provisions of this treaty official relations with Germany and with any of the German States will be resumed by the allied and associated powers"—that is, by all of them, not merely those who ratify the treaty—since this is the status, the situation left thereafter is similar to, if not, indeed, exactly like, that which obtained with reference to The Hague conventions, where each power signatory ratified with reservations and amendments such as it desired. If a power wished for the complete benefits of a Hague convention, it ratified the document as it stood. If it did not desire such advantages in toto, or if it were unwilling to accept the burdens imposed by the covenant, it ratified with reservations or amendments. In such case there was no talk or thought of reconvening The Hague conference in order that reservations or amendments might be made, and no necessity therefor existed, because it dealt with peace-time conditions.

Another analogous case that well illustrates the point I am making is that of the ratification of the general act for suppression of African slave trade, signed at Brussels on July 2, 1890, by the plenipotentiaries of 17 powers, including the United States. The protocol regarding the deposit of the American ratification sets forth the acceptance of a partial ratification, with various stipulations made by France and of ratification by the United States, with a disclaimer of interest and responsibility as to parts of the international engagements of the act in question. This well illustrates the lack of any necessity in such cases to reopen the whole of a negotiation.

Mr. President, if there be no objection, I shall insert as part of my remarks copies of the ratifications and protocols of those cases for the guidance of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KNOX. And so here with this document. The status of peace being created by ratification by three great powers, and those powers having the right, under the treaty they have thus ratified and put into force, to disarm Germany and obtain the commercial and other advantages which the treaty gives to them, they will be quite willing to let the rest of the world accept or reject the treaty benefits as they may wish. Indeed, if the other powers should forego the indemnities paid under the treaty, the great powers would have some advantages because it would leave the more German assets for them. Of course, as I have said, the great powers hope for the mighty strength of this Nation to enforce the indemnity—mellifluously termed "reparation" in the treaty—and will go any lengths to get it short of losing the treaty itself, for that, when the pinch comes, they will surely save.

Moreover, it is interesting to observe that even should we ratify this treaty with amendments and reservations and deposit our ratification in Paris, and even if we were the third power so to do, this would not necessarily mean that the treaty as written would not go into force. Indeed the chances are many to one that the treaty will go into force as written in spite of such a ratification by us or of any other action we might take, because if we ratified it with reservations and amendments before three other powers had unreservedly ratified, we should stand in a class by ourselves and all that need be done in order to put the treaty as written into effect between Germany and the great European powers would be for a third power, Italy, for example, to ratify it unconditionally, whereupon the treaty would then go into force as written and we would still stand on the outside without our amendments or reservations affecting the situation in any way whatsoever. And in this connection it is well to remember that our Executive is the only one whose heart will be broken if the league is touched; the powers are looking not at the league but at the rest of the treaty, and there is every reason to believe we may have our way about the league whatever that may be, if we will but put our military force and material resources behind the balance of the treaty.

Thus the status of peace being created by the ratification of the treaty by three great European powers, as it can and in all probability will be, no matter what we do, the question of any other power's accepting or rejecting its benefits or incurring its obligations is a matter in which that power is practically alone concerned.

That the foregoing is an accurate statement of the real situation is borne out to the fullest extent by the attitude which, according to the press, the Executive recently took through his personal and unofficial but all-powerful representative in Europe. The press then carried the information as to the President's colonel that "for the last four weeks in a quiet way he has been working to insure the league not starting without the United States as long as there was a chance that America could be the third power to ratify the Versailles treaty"; that he "has been working against considerable opposition to prevent the league plans from proceeding too rapidly"; and that he had induced Great Britain and France to bring pressure to bear upon Italy and Japan to the end that they should not ratify the treaty and thus put it into operation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, to whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. KNOX. I supposed everybody knew who the President's colonel was—the silent House.

Mr. McCORMICK. The silent statesman from Texas?

Mr. KNOX. Exactly so. I accept the amendment. That is to say, the President's colonel has been deliberately intermeddling in this situation in order to force the Senate to ratify this treaty without amendment or reservation, by allowing the Executive to continue to hold over this body as a club a false public opinion of the country built up and sustained on the erroneous supposition that peace can not come to us without our ratification of the treaty and that ratification with amendments or reservations on our part would require the reassembling of a new peace conference, and therefore the indefinite delay of peace.

May I digress long enough to observe that we have here before our eyes an example of the way in which our domestic affairs may be operated when we join the league? Here are two great powers of Europe joining in a conspiracy with our own Executive and aiding and abetting him in his deliberate and avowed intention of imposing upon the American people the treaty burdens and obligations which a great part of them are unwilling to undertake and which a majority of this very body is unwilling to sanction. If coercion such as this can be brought to bear before the league goes into effect, may we not pause, consider, and ask ourselves what may happen after the league is established?

We have also had pictured for us the sorry, even decrepit, figure we shall cut when "hat in hand" we humbly beseech Germany for her consent to modify this treaty in accordance with the reservations and amendments we may make. Assuming, as I feel I may and indeed as I must assume from the course events are taking, that three of the great powers will ratify this treaty as it is written without any changes whatsoever, and that, therefore, under the terms of the treaty it will thus go into effect, then what is there, I ask you, sir, that Germany can possibly consent to that will in any way, even the slightest, modify her obligations under this treaty? We can not by such a course change her indemnity, we can not change one important commission, we can not change one obligation which runs from Germany to the great powers under this treaty. And what obligation, pray—let but one be named—is there which runs from us to Germany to which her assent is needed for modification or to ameliorate which we need to approach as a suppliant either the German people or a German Government? It is certain, for example, that we can mitigate the provisions which run in our favor from Germany if we care to, but we probably should not have to crawl into the German presence upon our hands and knees, or even upright with "hat in hand," in order to get consent to this.

I repeat, it is not possible for us to force otherwise than by arms or by economic measures as potent as arms any change in this treaty as against either the allied powers or Germany, and it is not possible for any action which we take here to affect any of the obligations which run from Germany to the allied and associated powers if three of the powers ratify the treaty as written except in the one particular which I have already suggested in an earlier speech, namely, if we release in favor of Germany or of the powers the indemnities and the rights which Germany by this treaty has granted in our favor.

Why, then, this absurdity about reconvening the peace conference? Or can a majority of the people be fooled all the time?

In so far as the reestablishment of our commercial relations with Germany is concerned, I again advert to the fact that when this treaty goes into effect the status of war will be terminated and we shall be on a basis of peace with all its attendant rights and privileges. I also again call attention to the fact that so soon as the status of war is ended, "official relations with Germany and with any of the German States will be resumed by the allied and associated powers." All our consuls will reenter, our diplomatic representatives will be sent to Germany, and we shall be in the same position we were before the war, and this will happen when the treaty goes into effect, whether we ratify this treaty unamended, whether we ratify it with reservations and amendments, or whether we do not ratify it at all. Here again the people of the United States have been deliberately misled by the proponents of this league.

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION BY THE SENATE OF THE CONVENTION FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES, SIGNED AT THE HAGUE, 1907.

APRIL 2, 1908.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a convention signed by the delegates of the United States to the second international peace conference held at The Hague from June 16 to October 18, 1907, for the pacific settlement of international disputes, subject to the declaration made by the delegates of the United States before signing said convention, namely:

"Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

Resolved further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States approves this convention with the understanding that recourse to the permanent court for the settlement of differences can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties of arbitration heretofore or hereafter concluded between the parties in dispute; and the United States now exercises the option contained in article 53 of said convention to exclude the formulation of the "compromis" by the permanent court and hereby excludes from the competence of the permanent court the power to frame the "compromis" required by the general or special treaties of arbitration concluded or hereafter to be concluded by the United States, and further expressly declares that the "compromis" required by any treaty of arbitration to which the United States may be a party shall be settled only by agreement between the contracting parties, unless such treaty shall expressly provide otherwise.

"SENATE RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION.

"IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
"SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
"January 11, 1892.

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the general act signed at Brussels July 2, 1890, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and other powers for the suppression of the African slave trade, and for other purposes.

"Resolved further, That the Senate advise and consent to the acceptance of the partial ratification of the said general act on the part of the French Republic and to the stipulations relative thereto as set forth in the protocol signed at Brussels January 2, 1892.

"Resolved further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States of America, having neither possessions nor protectorates in Africa, hereby disclaims any intention, in ratifying this treaty, to indicate any interest whatsoever in the possessions or protectorates established or claimed on that continent by the other powers, or any approval of the wisdom, expediency, or lawfulness thereof, and does not join in any expression in the said general act which might be construed as such a declaration or acknowledgment; and, for this reason, that it is desirable that a copy of this resolution be inserted in the protocol to be drawn up at the time of the exchange of the ratification of this treaty on the part of the United States.

DEPOSIT OF THE RATIFICATION BY THE UNITED STATES.

[Protocol—Translation.]

February 2, 1892, conformably to article 99 of the general act of July 2, 1890, and to the unanimous decision of the signatory powers which prorogued to February 2, 1892, for the United States the term provided for in the same article 99, the undersigned envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America has deposited in the hands of the minister of foreign affairs of Belgium the ratifications of the President of the United States of the said general act.

At the request of his excellency, the following resolution, by which the Senate of the United States consented to the ratification of the President, has been inserted in the present protocol:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the general act signed at Brussels July 2, 1890, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and other powers, for the suppression of the African slave trade, and for other purposes.

"Resolved further, That the Senate advise and consent to the acceptance of the partial ratification of the said general act on the part of the French Republic and to the stipulations relative thereto, as set forth in the protocol signed at Brussels January 2, 1892.

"Resolved further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States of America, having neither possessions nor protectorates in Africa, hereby disclaims any intention, in ratifying this treaty, to indicate any interest whatsoever in the possessions or protectorates established or claimed on that continent by the other powers, or any approval of the wisdom, expediency, or lawfulness thereof, and does not join in any expressions in the said general act which might be construed as such a declaration or acknowledgment; and, for this reason, that it is desirable that a copy of this resolution be inserted in the protocol to be drawn up at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty on the part of the United States."

This resolution of the Senate of the United States having been preparatively and textually conveyed by the Government of His Majesty the King of the Belgians to the knowledge of all the signatory powers of the general act, the latter have given their assent to its insertion in the present protocol, which will remain annexed to the protocol of January 2, 1892.

Acknowledgment of this is given to the minister of the United States.

The ratification of the President of the United States having been found in good and due form, acknowledgment of their deposit is equally given to his excellency Mr. Edwin H. Terrell; they will be preserved in the archives of the ministry of foreign affairs of Belgium.

At the moment of proceeding to the signature of the present protocol, the minister of foreign affairs of His Majesty the King of the Belgians made it known that the representative of Russia, in the note expressing the assent of his Government, expressed the opinion that it would have been desirable that a translation into the French language accompany in the protocol the English text of the resolutions of the Senate of the United States of America and that at all events the absence of this translation is not to form a precedent.

A certified copy of the present protocol will be addressed by the Belgian Government to the signatory powers of the general act.

Done at Brussels, February 2, 1892.

[SEAL.] THE PRINCE DE CHIMAY,
The Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am not much given to digging into the musty tomes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of proving inconsistency on the part of my fellow Senators or any other man in public life. I realize fully the strength of the old saw, "Consistency is for small minds," altogether too frequently invoked to prove wisdom on the part of those who constantly shift their position. But I am also aware of the fact that changing conditions bring changing minds; and therefore, except for the very remarkable shift in the mental attitude of my friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], with reference to equality of votes as between England and the United States, I would not advert to speeches made by him on the same subject upon a former occasion.

There is perhaps another reason which would make my remarks at this time peculiarly appropriate. The Senator has constantly maintained in speeches on the floor of the Senate that those of us who are opposed to this treaty as the President brought it back from France are animated solely by partisan reasons. The truth about it is that we have not believed that there was partisanship in this great question, and there was no reason why the Republican Party at any time should have sought to inject this question into politics or politics into this question. I have never seen a Republican in the United States in my much traveling and much speaking who has not believed that the Republican Party had the next campaign already fought and the next victory won. I have never seen a Democrat with whom I have talked in private conversation but that admitted that his party was at least at a very great disadvantage in the approaching campaign. We believed that we had the victory already won—won upon the administration of the Democratic Party, won upon its railroad administration, upon its mismanagement of the telegraph and the telephone lines, upon its vast expenditures, and upon the general record, as we believed, of incompetency as displayed by the administration in Washington.

Therefore it was not essential in the mind of any Republican that any new issue should arise in order to enable the Republican Party to win, and it is wide of the mark to assert that the Republican Party insisted upon injecting this new question into the campaign in order that it might have a winning issue.

Upon the other hand, it might with far greater truthfulness be charged that the Democratic Party created a new issue; that they were seeking for some new light to be shed around them that might lead them out of the wilderness in which they have been wandering for the last three or four years. Why, Senators, we all recall that similar conditions existed in 1916, when we believed that on the economic problems presented the Democratic Party was destined to a sure defeat, and that a new issue was invoked which at that time enabled them to win the victory; and it might be charged that they are now seeking to adopt the same methods and pursue the same policy as brought them the administration in 1916; and yet, while we might with greater truthfulness charge that upon Members upon the other side, yet I never choose to attribute such motives to them. I believe that in proposing this course they have been guided by nothing but the highest and most patriotic impulses, and I ascribe to them no motives other or lower than those I claim for myself and for my associates.

Upon this side we have not had party harmony. There has been something of division, something of discord, something of dissent. Here there has been absolute independence of thought and of feeling and of action upon this problem, far more so than over upon the other side.

Therefore, so far as partisan politics is concerned, certainly it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to charge that we are guilty of partisanship in the attitude we have assumed upon this question. So I think, although I do not directly charge it upon the Senator, that if any man can be said to be animated by partisan bias in this conflict, it is the Senator from Nebraska.

My reason for this assertion is that in 1911 there was brought here for ratification an arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States. That treaty was pending in this body from the 3d of August, 1911, until the 5th of March, 1912, or seven long months. This treaty has been here a scant four months, and yet we are charged with delay and with procrastination, and even with filibustering. That was simply a proposition to submit to arbitration future disputes between Great Britain and the United States, each side to select three for the purpose of establishing a tribunal to which controverted questions might be referred.

I call attention, in order to show the marked change that has come over the spirit of the dreams of my friend from Nebraska, to some of the provisions of that very modest treaty. Article 1 recites:

> All differences hereafter arising between the high contracting parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise—

And mark this language—

> and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by convention of October 18, 1917—

It will be observed, Senators, that this provided for the submission of all justiciable questions. This left out altogether every question of national honor and all those other things that we have constantly held could not be arbitrated, because our national rights, our national honor, might be involved in the controversy. This omitted it, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who conducted the negotiations upon the part of the United States, he then being the Secretary of State in the Cabinet, has informed me that he purposely wrote those words in that treaty. So that, broadly considered, this treaty resolved itself into a proposition to appoint three men upon the part of Great Britain and three upon the part of the United States to act as a court of arbitration, to which might be referred all questions of dispute having no reference to national honor or to national life.

Now, let me proceed. The treaty continues:

> or to some other arbitral tribunal, as shall (may) be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference and the procedure thereunder.
> The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, His Majesty's Government reserving the right before concluding a special agreement in any matter affecting the interests of a self-governing dominion of the British Empire to obtain the concurrence therein of the government of that dominion.
> Such agreements shall be binding when confirmed by the two Governments by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE 2.

> The high contracting parties further agree to institute, as occasion arises and as hereinafter provided, a joint high commission of inquiry, to which, upon the request of either party, shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the parties within the scope of article 1 before such controversy has been submitted to arbitration, and also any other controversy hereafter arising between them, even if they are not agreed that it falls within the scope of article 1: Provided, however, That such reference may be postponed until the expiration of one year after the date of the formal request therefor, in order to afford an opportunity for diplomatic discussion and adjustment of the questions in controversy, if either party desires such postponement.
> Whenever a question or matter of difference is referred to the joint high commission of inquiry, as herein provided, each of the high contracting parties shall designate three of its nationals to act as members of the commission of inquiry for the purposes of such reference; or the commission may be otherwise constituted in any particular case by the terms of reference, the membership of the commission and the terms of reference to be determined in each case by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE 3.

> The joint high commission of inquiry, instituted in each case as provided for in article 2, is authorized to examine into and report upon the particular questions or matters referred to it, for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts, and to define the issues presented by such questions, and also to include in its report such recommendations and conclusions as may be appropriate.

What power, then, had this joint high commission of inquiry? Listen to the definition as conferred by the terms of article 3:

> The reports of the commission shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted, either on the facts or on the law and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

In other words, this was nothing more nor less, as the terms disclose, than a proposition to appoint a commission of three upon the part of England and three upon the part of the United States who should sit and listen to and inquire into disputed propositions between the two nations, with no power to determine and no authority to decide.

Yet, after my friend had made his speech, to which I shall refer, in which he expressed grave alarm as to the future dominance of Great Britain over the United States, they proposed and voted into this almost insipid agreement this safety clause.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
(Legislative day, Mar. 5, 1912; calendar day, Mar. 7, 1912.)

> Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on August 3, 1911, extending the scope and obligation of the policy of arbitration adopted in the present arbitration treaty of April 4, 1908, between the two countries, so as to exclude certain exceptions contained in that treaty and to provide means for the peaceful solution of all questions of difference which it shall be found impossible in future to settle by diplomacy with the following amendments:

I call my friend's attention to this as a remarkable reservation to preserve the independence and maintain the sovereignty of the United States, even as against a court of arbitration, with no power to decide and no authority to determine. Listen to it once more and see how nearly some of the reservations proposed to the pending treaty harmonize with it:

> Provided, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or monied obligation of any State of the United States—> or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy.

So, even with that mild and pacific agreement, which provided nothing more than the selection of three upon each side, three upon the part of Great Britain and three upon the part of the United States, to which should be submitted all questions of dispute with no power to decide, the Senator announced that he would not vote for such a treaty because it would mean the domination of England over America without these very reservations, most of which we now seek to incorporate into this treaty.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to some of the remarks made by my honorable friend, in order that I may compare them, I trust for the edification of the Senate, to the remarks made by the Senator to-day. He voted against the Johnson amendment, which was designed to give us as many votes as Great Britain and her colonies. He has announced that he would vote against these other amendments, one of which brings England's vote down to ours, the other of which gives us an equal vote with England and her colonies.

Now, bearing that in mind, I want to call attention to some remarks made by the Senator in his utterances at that time, as recently as March, 1912. At that time that treaty was under discussion, and the Senator used this language with reference to its inspiration:

I quoted from the speech of Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons, in which he said that if the treaty should be ratified it would, in his opinion, probably be followed by other agreements between the United States and Great Britain, the effect of which would be that if Great Britain became embroiled in hostilities with another country having no such arbitration agreement the United States would go to the aid of Great Britain.

Because he thought there was involved in that treaty a possibility of the United States being compelled to go to the aid of Great Britain, he rose up to say that he would have none of it, and spewed it out of his mouth as an unworthy proposition. But let me proceed. He continued:

But my purpose to-day is to demonstrate to the Senate that the same purpose which Sir Edward Grey expressed as prevailing in Great Britain, that this treaty shall be only the first step toward an alliance between the two countries, exists in this country, existed in the initiation of the treaty. Moreover, I shall prove that it now dominates those who are attempting to influence the Senate of the United States by arousing the public opinion of the country in favor of the ratification of the treaty without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

The Senator waxed eloquent as to the danger that would come to the United States because the ominous shadow of Great Britain's greatness would be thrust across the coming pathway of the Republic. Then he proceeds:

So, Mr. President, I feel warranted in saying that the broadening language of this treaty is not what is sought by those who are pushing it. What they seek is the creation of the commission by which the Senate, representing the American people, shall lose in part, at least, its power to control the interpretation of the treaty.

Yet he would have none of it. That gnat he could not swallow. This present camel walks in with no impediment to its ingress.

He said further:

I might quote from some Americans who have openly declared themselves as in favor of an alliance with Great Britain; I might quote from our ambassador to Great Britain, who recently, in a banquet speech, has proclaimed his hope that there might be a unity of the English-speaking races, but I go by them. I say here, now, that the power behind the throne—

Here is the invidious force that my friend discovered:

the power which is forcing these treaties upon the Senate in their present form, which is arousing, or attempting to arouse, public sentiment for them, is the power of Andrew Carnegie's money.

There was the ominous power that thrust this combination, unholy in character, unpatriotic in nature, upon the Senate of the United States—Andrew Carnegie's money. He continued:

Not only has he created a board of trustees, consisting of some 27 members, and turned over to it $10,000,000, but he has directly, through that organization, and also personally for himself, contributed to the support of all the leading organizations in the country which are at the present time, and have been for months, engaged in stirring up the people of the United States to petition the Senate to ratify these treaties—

Listen to this old language—without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t."

Mr. McCORMICK. Stirred up the people to petition the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. To petition the Senate. What a monstrous proposition. And it called forth all the language of wrath of which my friend was capable, and he hunted the dictionary to find new adjectives in which to inveigh against the men who were seeking to influence the people to control the Senate of the United States, as I shall further show.

Then followed a description of the various institutions that had been organized in the United States and the various societies that had been incorporated for the purpose of stirring up public sentiment to control the Senate of the United States. Then he concluded by saying:

I say that it is brought to bear for this treaty, not because the treaty proposes arbitration—

Although that is all there was to it, I may say in passing—not because it broadens the scope of arbitration, because the Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday that, with all those desirable provisions, still the treaty would probably be rejected if the Senate were to cut out of it that provision which creates the joint high commission and permits it to supersede the Senate in the interpretation of the terms of the treaty itself. It is the joint high commission which is desired. It is the Carnegie idea to bring together the two Governments of the United States and Great Britain into one official body.

And so the Senator saw in the womb of the future this awful threat of a union of Great Britain and the United States, involved and wrapped up in the feeble terms of that mere arbitration treaty, that proposed, and I repeat because it is worthy of repetition, only three men from England and three men from the United States, to constitute a board of arbitration to which all questions of dispute might be submitted, save only questions of national honor and questions of national life. After they had fully determined upon it, what was their power? It was only to report, but with no authority to enforce their decree.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Was it proposed at that time that the British members of the board should be 18, and 3 for the United States? I am seeking the real basis of the objection of the Senator from Nebraska. Perhaps the failure to make such a provision led to his opposition to the treaty.

Mr. WATSON. I think not. I think my friend from Illinois will conclude later on that even three to three aroused the Senator's alarm, lest Great Britain might overreach us by their diplomacy, as I shall show by a remark later on.

It is influences of this sort, influences due to the money of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, which inflict upon Senators such postal-card communications as I have here—

Evidently holding one up—

Something like a hundred received this week, within a few days, with my name printed upon the front of the postal card and a request upon the back of the postal card that I vote for these treaties.

Heaven spare the mark! Mr. President, I forbear from further comment, but the Senator himself has gotten up on the floor from time to time and read letters and presented newspaper articles and has read innumerable telegrams from the State of the Senator from California—what for?

With my name printed upon the front of the postal card and a request upon its back that I vote for this treaty.

So the Senator has seen fit to resort to the methods to force this treaty that he then so forcefully denounced and so bitterly characterized. He goes on further and says, after speaking of these various petitions that came to him from his constituency and from other parts of the Republic:

And I pay as much attention, when I receive a communication in the cramped, trembling hand of a farmer as I would to a communication dictated in the office of a banker or a business man; but I do not bow to a public opinion aroused in this artificial way, simply by the use of money, to carry out a purpose to make a false union a real alliance between the United States and Great Britain.

Let me go on, because if I get to commenting I will take too much time. So many things spring to one's mind when he reads a speech of that kind, and contrasts the remarks with those made by the Senator to-day and other remarks made by him upon the pending treaty in the days gone by, that language fails to draw the parallel or the imagination to compass the conversion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Then, in another speech, on the 14th, the Senator said:

This fear of an alliance between England and the United States is not my own fear. It was the interpretation placed upon these treaties by the secretary for foreign affairs of Great Britain, not in interviews, nor as a matter of rumor, but in a reported speech in the House of Commons, and I said that if Great Britain were entering into these treaties with that understanding of their ultimate result, it was something which we in the United States—

Listen to this—

It was something which we in the United States, who want no entangling alliance, should take into account very seriously.

He was speaking only of that mild arbitration treaty.

He said in a further speech:

There has been a good deal of a disposition on the part of orators who have appeared before various public meetings, and on behalf of writers who have put forth their printed arguments, to arrogate to themselves a monopoly of the particular custody of the dove of peace, a disposition to assume that they, and only they, favor the idea of the peaceful settlement of international differences. The people have been led to believe that unless they arouse themselves to influence the Senate of the United States to ratify these treaties in the exact form that they come from the State Department and the President, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," we would probably be involved in hostilities with Great Britain.

Think of it, Senators. Think of the fear that the fancy of my friend engendered, and think of the spooks and goblins with which his imagination peopled the air, if they ratified that simple treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing for a commission of three, and three simply to investigate, with no power to report with authority.

We are told that it is perfectly constitutional for the Senate of the United States to ratify this treaty, and thus abdicate for the future its right to pass upon the application and rule on the interpretation of the treaty. Mr. President, it may be constitutional, but I do not think it wise—

Listen to this—

Because I believe that it will involve us in future trouble. I do not believe it safe, because I believe it will embroil us in innumerable international difficulties in the future in the application of the treaty.

And yet the Senator takes this new treaty, the council with its power, the assembly with its authority, the league with its scope—takes it all, and not only that but insists that not to take it is unpatriotic. The Senator from Nebraska continued:

It certainly is not American. There is at the present time, and always has been, this radical difference between the treaty-making power of the monarchies of Europe and the treaty-making power of the United States. In the United States the President can not make a treaty and have it approved and executed by his Cabinet or appointees after the European fashion, but he is required, under the Constitution, to submit it to the Senate for its ratification. That—is not the American idea.

Said the Senator—

And yet, my friends, when we stop to consider the manner in which this treaty was formulated and brought into the United States and contemplate the meekness—and I do not say it offensively—of the Senator in accepting it, we can not but believe his conversion between then and now is more astounding than that of Paul on his way to Damascus.

It is the American idea that the representatives of the people shall have a voice in the ratification of a treaty, but if this proposed clause of section 3 becomes a part of the treaty, that difference disappears as far as our relations with Great Britain are concerned. Hereafter the interpretation of that treaty and the application of it pass from the hands of the Senate into the control of the commission, whose American members are appointed by the President of the United States.

Then the Senator from Nebraska was not willing to submit these questions, wholly for debate, to a joint commission of inquiry where three men were appointed by the President of the United States; but now without a grimace swallows the proposition to submit to a council, where but one man represents the United States, all the mighty power conferred upon this league by article 10, article 12, article 15, and the other articles that bestow jurisdiction and confer authority.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is quoting from a speech delivered to the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska on January 4, 1912, I think. I should like to ask the Senator if the Senator from Nebraska at that time did not refer to the fact that the then existing arbitration treaty guarded the vital interests and the national honor of the United States, and that there was nothing in the then pending treaty which he was discussing which did guard such interests, and did he not give that as one of his objections to it?

Mr. WATSON. He certainly did. Will the Senator kindly read that part of it?

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Nebraska said:

The existing treaty—

That was the Roosevelt-Root treaty—

left it for the President and the Senate to decide, on behalf of the United States, what were vital interests, what is involved in the term national honor, and what was meant by third parties. The pending treaty, however, does not leave the decision of what is justiciable difference to the President and the Senate. It creates a joint high commission and empowers this joint high commission of six members to decide what questions are justiciable and what are not justiciable.

I call the attention of the Senator to the language used at that time by the Senator from Nebraska, because the now pending treaty, which the Senator from Nebraska is so vigorously supporting, provides for a commission of nine, of whom the United States has one member, for the decision of questions in which the United States is interested.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator for his interruption, because it throws additional light upon the very remarkable change of the Senator from Nebraska. But I call attention to one or two other quotations from his speech, and I am especially anxious that Senators may listen to this, because I think it is the very crux of his argument and goes to the very core of the question.

But, Mr. President, there is another objection to this particular clause of the treaty which creates this joint high commission. It will involve us in an entangling alliance with Great Britain.

I have already called attention to the very feeble character of the proposed commission and the fact that it possessed no power and exercised no authority, and have recited how all of the reservations I have read were proposed—reservations like unto those pending here now, which the Senator from Nebraska is fighting with might and main, and yet at that time he voted for those and vehemently declared that if they were rejected from that treaty he would not support it, because it would endanger the future of the country and establish an alliance with Great Britain. And then the Senator continued:

I have a great admiration, Mr. President, for the British people, but I am not in favor of departing from the old American idea of isolation.

I warmly commend my friend's words to him now.

I do not believe in an entangling alliance with any country, and I believe it is capable of demonstration that this treaty is regarded—in England, at least—as the first step toward an English-American alliance. * * * Mr. President, that language is peculiarly significant—

Speaking of certain language to which he refers—coming at a time when the relations between Great Britain and Germany were strained—as, to some extent, they still are strained—coming from the secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, and having particular reference to the treaty with the United States, can we put any other interpretation upon that language than to say that, in the opinion of Sir Edward Grey, if the treaty were made between Great Britain and the United States and Germany refused to enter into such a treaty of arbitration and had a quarrel with Great Britain the next natural step would be for the United States and Great Britain to join each other as against Germany? There is no other possible interpretation that can be placed upon the speech of Sir Edward Grey.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Is that the same Sir Edward Grey who is now the ambassador of Great Britain to the United States of America?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding—the same Sir Edward Grey. Yet the Senator from Nebraska was not willing to accept the modest treaty then pending containing mild provisions and limited in power, because if there was trouble between Great Britain and Germany the United States, under its provisions, would be compelled in honor to fly to the succor of Great Britain; but now he is entirely willing to accept a treaty which compels the United States to guarantee the territorial integrity and the political independence of all the members of the league and places the burdens of the world upon the shoulders of the people of America. The Senator from Nebraska continued:

It is in accord with a widespread desire in Great Britain for an alliance between the United States and Great Britain. That this desire is harbored also by many people in the United States may be true, but it is certainly not the American idea and it is certainly not in accord with the traditions of this country. It is evident that this speech, so interpreted, affords ample ground for the belief that England, for her own purposes, desires this treaty as a basis for an alliance in the future with the United States. We certainly want no alliance with any country and must avoid becoming so involved.

How heartily I commend the language and the wisdom of my friend to him in this time of turmoil and doubt.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, probably, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, the difficulty was that under the proposed alliance which was then so vigorously denounced, England had only an equal vote with the United States, while now it is proposed that she shall have six votes to our one.

Mr. WATSON. Which the Senator from Nebraska favors. I quote further from the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska on the occasion referred to:

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has recently published a small document, which he has distributed undoubtedly to all Members of the Senate, in which he argues that while the joint high commission has the power, in the first place, to decide what questions are justiciable, yet the Senate can exercise a restraint over the joint high commission, and can modify or nullify its act by refusing to give consent to the agreement which must be made for each specific case before it is submitted to arbitration. That of itself is an argument against the creation of the commission. It involves a doubt. It is likely to place the Senate of the United States in a position where it must either recognize the authority of the joint high commission and accept its interpretation, however obnoxious, or it must repudiate the decision of the joint high commission, and leave us open to the charge of bad faith in entering into this treaty; in other words, the provision giving the joint high commission that power is either a danger or, as the Senator from Mississippi would argue, it is a humbug. In either case it is likely to involve us in future controversies as to its interpretation.

Mr. President, the simple language of that treaty the Senator could not accept because it involved a doubt; and yet all of the murky sentences, all of the involved phrases, and all of the doubtful constructions involved in the interpretation of every section of the pending treaty he accepts, and insists that it is unwise and unpatriotic to change even the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," to use his own language, to which I respectfully refer him.

Now, let me go on to the finality.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, before the Senator from Indiana skips, as he has just suggested that he might do——

Mr. WATSON. I am skipping a great deal.

Mr. FALL. I ask him if he does not find the following language also, which, it strikes me, is very significant, coming from the tongue of the Senator from Nebraska:

Mr. President, anyone looking onto the future, I believe, must admit that if this treaty, as it comes to us, is ratified by the Senate and goes into effect Great Britain will have ten times the number of demands upon us for arbitration of questions in which she is interested as the proponent that we will have upon her. That is the natural course of events. Her interests are such, her policies are such, that she will be constantly seeking to restrain us and interfere with the American policies of this country.

Mr. WATSON. I was about to read that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right; go right on and finish the sentence.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Nebraska continued:

For that reason I think this country would be unwise to put itself, by an ironclad and practically unlimited treaty, in the position of promising to submit everything to arbitration that is justiciable, and then leave the question of justiciability to a mixed commission whose three American members are appointed by the President and responsible only to him.

Mr. WATSON. "And responsible only to him."

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Nebraska continued:

The interests of the country will be safer in the care of the Senate, and its restraint on the President should be maintained as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. WATSON. Which is a very significant clause in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska. I think it might be well if Senators would to-morrow read the part of the speech of the Senator which the Senator from New Mexico has read into the RECORD, because it is peculiarly appropriate at this time. And, that the Senate may catch the full significance of these statements, I repeat them:

Any one looking into the future, I believe, must admit that if this treaty as it comes to us is ratified by the Senate and goes into effect Great Britain will have ten times the number of demands upon us for the arbitration of questions in which she is interested as the proponent that we will have upon her. That is the natural course of events. Her interests are such, her policies are such, that she will be constantly seeking to restrain us and interfere with the American policies of the country.

If that were true then, how much more true is it now? If it were simple then, how complex has it now become? If it were one thing then, how multiplied the danger that arises from the document which now demands our attention? But that does not in the slightest degree affect the complacency of our friend from Nebraska.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Indiana emphasize the fact that with all the dangers staring us in the face and which we must confront at that time Great Britain had only an equal number of votes with the United States.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. While now she has six to one.

Mr. WATSON. I think I have called attention, or tried to call attention, over and over again to the fact that the Senator from Nebraska saw all of those dangers and that ominous cloud upon the horizon threatening to swoop down upon us and paralyze us with its terror under a proposed treaty where England had but three votes and we had three, and yet he accepts without a tremor with perfect complacency and supreme self-confidence the proposition now before us under which England has six votes and we have but one.

To resume reading from the address of the Senator from Nebraska:

Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from Maryland as to the interpretation of this particular clause gives added force to what I have said, that it is proposed here to adopt a treaty and to incorporate in it a new idea concerning which there must inevitably be differences of opinion. I will quote, however, in order to make my remarks understandable, the exact language of the treaty at this point.

Then occurred a colloquy between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Maryland, following which the language of the treaty was quoted; but I hurry on.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this language in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska which was his climax, and I will make it mine. The Senator said:

But, to resume, I think if we look over the history of the United States in recent years we will conclude that we are in more danger from the diplomats of Great Britain than we are from her dreadnoughts, and I object to any treaty which is likely further to complicate the relations between the countries and which is likely to open the door to further diplomatic concessions of an international nature.

I am in favor of the pending treaty, providing the last portion of article 3, which empowers the high joint commission to supersede the Senate of the United States in the interpretation of treaties, is stricken out; and I also favor some declaration in the resolution of ratification that we except specifically from further arbitration such questions as involve our permanent national policies or such questions as relate purely to matters of American government.

Senators, I have thought it worth while to go back into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and dig up the speeches made by the Senator from Nebraska when that mild treaty was pending before the Senate of the United States—and it was pending here for seven months—upon which the Senator from Nebraska made three different assaults, and for which he would not consent to vote unless it was so radically modified as to leave it absolutely insipid. It must not be forgotten, for that is the main point of the controversy, that there were provided but three representatives of the British Empire and three representatives of the United States, constituting merely a court of arbitration, with no final power to decide and no ultimate authority to determine; and yet the Senator saw in that instrument an ominous danger to the institutions of the United States, because it was a document, no doubt, subject to future interpretation, and because in it might lurk the ultimate dominance of Great Britain over the United States, and because he saw in it the handiwork of British statesmen more direful and dangerous than her dreadnoughts. And now, in unbelievable contrast, he cheerfully—aye, gleefully—champions a proposition to place all the resources of the United States at the disposal of the same Great Britain to maintain her territorial integrity and her imperial unity throughout all coming time.

And now the Senator comes into the Senate every day and in language vehement and denunciatory assails those of us who are not willing to accept the pending proposition without—to use his favorite phraseology—the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." I stand with the Senator of 1912; I am against the Senator of 1919.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. FALL. There is so much good material and so much Americanism in the speech which the Senator from Indiana has been referring that naturally it is difficult for one Senator to select from the great abundance——

Mr. WATSON. Of rich material.

Mr. FALL. It is difficult to select those beautiful jewels of American thought which fell at that time with such eloquence from the lips of the Senator from Nebraska. For that reason I have been assisting the Senator in a slight degree.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. FALL. However, before the Senator closes the quotation, I should like to call attention to these words:

Are we, under these circumstances, proposing to submit the interpretation of the treaty to three Americans, nominated by the President, and associated with three British commissioners, rather than to have it remain where it has remained for all time—in the Senate of the United States—and where the Constitution intended it should remain?

Mr. President, I might suggest that under the direct provision of the league covenant it is distinctly provided that among the subjects of which the council shall have cognizance are disputes concerning treaties. The Senator from Nebraska at that time, when arbitration was suggested, thought that no power except the Senate should speak upon such a question, and repudiated, with some degree of heat, I might say, the suggestion that even in a preliminary way the commissioners of the United States and three commissioners of Great Britain could pass upon it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, there are so many nuggets of wisdom and patriotism in the three speeches of the Senator from Nebraska, from which I have taken certain excerpts, that I think they should be published connectedly, and I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD those addresses as they have been compiled in the document from which I have read.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in connection with this subject, before the Senator closes, in view of the disposition shown by the Senator from Nebraska to question the good faith of the Senators who are opposed to the treaty, and rather to insist that they have been attempting to delay final action upon it, it might be pertinent to suggest that the pending treaty came into this body about three months ago, and that the treaty which the Senator was so vigorously opposing at that time was in course of ratification seven months.

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator that I have already adverted to that fact.

Mr. FALL. I am glad the Senator did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the addresses referred to by the Senator from Indiana will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., 2d sess. (Feb. 15–Mar. 9, 1912), vol. 48, pt. 3, pp. 2943, etc.]

"IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
"March 7, 1912.

SPEECH OF SENATOR HITCHCOCK.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, several weeks ago, speaking on the subject of the pending arbitration treaty with Great Britain, I undertook to show that in Great Britain the pending treaty was regarded as the first step toward an alliance between the United States and Great Britain. I quoted from the speech of Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons, in which he said that if the treaty should be ratified it would, in his opinion, probably be followed by other agreements between the United States and Great Britain the effect of which would be that if Great Britain became embroiled in hostilities with another country having no such arbitration agreement the United States would go to the aid of Great Britain. The speech of Sir Edward Grey had a peculiar significance at the time, because it was delivered when relations between Great Britain and Germany were strained to the breaking, and it had a peculiar significance also because Sir Edward Grey stood then and now stands at the head of the great department of foreign affairs of Great Britain. Not only that, but he had been one of those who had initiated the negotiations for the treaty.

"Mr. President, my purpose to-day is to demonstrate that there exists in the United States a similar purpose to that which Sir Edward Grey describes. If the Senator from New York [Mr. Root] is right in saying that the speech of Mr. Secretary Knox, delivered before a public meeting in an American city, shall be taken as a means of interpreting this treaty, how much more, from the British standpoint at least, shall we say that the speech of Sir Edward Grey, delivered in his official capacity in the House of Commons, has the same effect as placing the British interpretation upon that treaty?

"But my purpose to-day is to demonstrate to the Senate that the same purpose which Sir Edward Grey expressed as prevailing in Great Britain, that this treaty shall be only the first step toward an alliance between the two countries, exists in this country, existed in the initiation of the treaty. Moreover, I shall prove that it now dominates those who are attempting to influence the Senate of the United States by arousing the public opinion of the country in favor of the ratification of the treaty without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

"Mr. President, what is the importance of this treaty? Does it lie in the fact that the treaty does away with certain exceptions in the old treaty? The treaty which we have now provides that we shall arbitrate all questions with Great Britain that do not involve national honor, vital interests, or third parties. One might think that doing away with these exceptions would give us a new treaty to be hailed with delight by those who stand for universal arbitration; but we heard upon the floor of the Senate yesterday a statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that, in his opinion, the treaty would fail and be rejected by Great Britain if the Senate of the United States should strike out a part of article 3, which gives to the commission the power to interpret the treaty; that is, that Great Britain would not want the treaty with all its broad provisions; would not want the treaty with its enlarged powers for the arbitrators; would not want the treaty with its broader scope of arbitration unless the Senate consented to have the joint high commission remain as the feature of the treaty—the commission, which able lawyers have asserted and which they to-day believe, will supersede the Senate of the United States in interpreting the treaty.

"So, Mr. President, I feel warranted in saying that the broadening language of this treaty is not what is sought by those who are pushing it. What they seek is the creation of the commission by which the Senate, representing the American people, shall lose in part, at least, its power to control the interpretation of the treaty.

"I might quote from some Americans who have openly declared themselves as in favor of an alliance with Great Britain; I might quote from our ambassador to Great Britain, who recently, in a banquet speech, has proclaimed his hope that there might be a unity of the English-speaking races; but I go by them. I say here now that the power behind the throne, the power which is forcing these treaties upon the Senate in their present form, which is arousing, or attempting to arouse, public sentiment for them, is the power of Andrew Carnegie's money. Not only has he created a board of trustees, consisting of some 27 members, and turned over to it $10,000,000, but he has directly, through that organization, and also personally for himself, contributed to the support of all the leading organizations in the country which are at the present time, and have been for months, engaged in stirring up the people of the United States to petition the Senate to ratify these treaties without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

"We have, first, the American Peace Society, with its branches in all parts of the United States, a powerful body, and if it would devote its energies to the securing of international peace and the increase of the practice of arbitration, I would acclaim it a patriotic organization.

"There is, second, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which is busily at work among the religious organizations, using Andrew Carnegie's money, arousing the people of the churches to take action, without even knowing whether there is an existing arbitration treaty or not or what the terms are of the proposed new arbitration treaty.

"There is, third, the American Association for International Conciliation, a great organization, which boasts that it sent out at one time 250,000 copies of a document.

"Fourth, there is the American Peace Arbitration League of New York.

"Fifth, there is the National Committee to Celebrate the Peace Anniversary Between the United States and Great Britain.

"Referring to the last of these, I want to read some of the objects that are to be attained by this peace-celebration committee of which Andrew Carnegie was the chairman. One of them is:

"That an unlimited arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States shall be negotiated and signed, a project which bids fair to be accomplished before the anniversary.

"Another object is:

"That a special textbook devoted to the relations of the United States with Great Britain, and especially with Canada, for the last century, shall be prepared under the direction of competent historians in both countries and used in all schools where the English language is spoken during the period preceding the centennial anniversary of the signing of the treaty of Ghent, and that the schools shall then join in its celebration.

"A textbook to rewrite the history of relations between the United States and Great Britain as though history was not already correct, as though it must be censored and amended!

"Another of the objects of this association is:

"That Sulgrave Manor, in Northamptonshire, England, the home of George Washington's ancestors, shall be purchased by popular subscription in both countries as a visible monument to the cordial relations existing between the two great branches of the English-speaking peoples.

"I shall not stop to read all of the other purposes, many of which are foreign to the legitimate purpose of a celebration, but which have been brought in there as expressing the personal desires of Andrew Carnegie.

"But, now, Mr. President, I am going to read from an article written by Andrew Carnegie 20 years ago, when he was in his prime, which expresses, as is evident, the passionate desire of his heart that the United States shall again become an integral part of the British Empire. I read from the North American Review of 1893 the following most astonishing language. I had a faint recollection of it, but I was amazed recently on sending for the volume to read the exact language. I only quote certain paragraphs in the article.

"Mr. Carnegie says, in opening his article:

"Until a little more than a hundred years ago the English-speaking race dwelt together in unity, the American being as much a citizen of Britain as the Scotchman, Welshman, or Irishman. A difference, unhappily, arose under the British constitution, their common heritage, as to the right of the citizens of the older part of the State to tax their fellows in the newer part across the sea without their consent; but separation was not contemplated by Washington, Franklin, Adams, Jefferson, Jay, and other leaders. On the contrary, these great men never ceased to proclaim their loyalty to, and their desire to remain part of, Britain; and they disclaimed any idea of separation, which was indeed accepted at last, but only when forced upon them as a sad necessity from which there was no honorable escape if they were to maintain the rights they had acquired, not as American but as British citizens.

"Think of it! The author of the Declaration of Independence is pictured as never having ceased to proclaim his loyalty to, and desire to remain a part of, Britain! The great patriot at the head of our armies is described as always proclaiming his loyalty to Great Britain.

"I turn to page 690 of the same volume and find this:

"Both Briton and American being now fully agreed that those who made the attempt to tax without giving the right of representation were wrong, and that in resisting this the colonists vindicated their rights as British citizens, and, therefore, only did their duty, the question arises: Is a separation thus forced upon one of the parties, and now thus deeply regretted by the other, to be permanent? I can not think so, and I crave permission to adduce some considerations in support of my belief that the future is certainly to see a reunion of the separated parts and once again a common citizenship.

"I turn now to page 702 of the same volume. He had, prior to this, been discussing the various objections, which he proceeds to remove by a very careful argument of minute detail and particularity. He then gives this little review of a reunited empire:

"Numerous as would be the States comprising the reunited nation, each possessing equal rights, still Britain, as the home of the race, would ever retain precedence—first among equals. However great the number of the children who might sit around her in council, there could never be but one mother, and that mother Britain.

"I turn now to page 708 of the same volume:

"Let no man imagine that I write as a partisan in dealing with these questions. I know no party in this great argument, either in America or in Britain. Whatever obstructs reunion I oppose; whatever promotes reunion I favor. I judge all political questions from this standpoint. All party divisions sink into nothingness in my thoughts compared with the reunion of our race.

"And then I turn, in conclusion, to the last paragraph of the article:

"Let men say what they will, therefore; I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again 'the reunited States'—the British-American union.

"Mr. President, I have read parts of that article by Andrew Carnegie in order to show his life's purpose. In a great Republic like the United States the opinion of an individual, however great, might not amount to much; the influence which he may exercise may not be great, but consider that this man, animated by this purpose, is the possessor of three or four hundred million dollars, wrung from the industry of the American people by the favor of law; that he is in a position to devote $10,000,000 here and $20,000,000 there to educational purposes; that this money can be used to influence churches, to hire orators, to organize press bureaus. To thus mold public opinion his wealth is sufficient to bring considerable influence to bear upon the Senate. I say that it is brought to bear for this treaty, not because the treaty proposes arbitration, not because it broadens the scope of arbitration, because the Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday that, with all those desirable provisions, still the treaty would probably be rejected if the Senate were to cut out of it that provision which creates the joint high commission and permits it to supersede the Senate in the interpretation of the terms of the treaty itself. It is the joint high commission which is desired. It is the Carnegie idea to bring together the two Governments of the United States and Great Britain into one official body.

"It is well, Mr. President, when we are on the eve of voting upon this treaty to take an account and to realize that all the so-called public opinion which has been brought to bear upon the Senate in favor of this treaty containing, as it does, that commission provision is not chiefly in the interest of arbitration. That is not the motive behind the mighty power which has aroused this public sentiment, so called. The motive behind that purpose is to bring about an alliance, at least, as Sir Edward Grey himself said, between the United States and Great Britain, and force the United States to abandon its position of isolation, friendly with all nations, but having no entangling alliances with any.

"It is influences of this sort, influences due to the money of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, which inflict upon Senators such postal-card communications as I have here—something like a hundred received this week, within a few days, with my name printed upon the front of the postal card and a request upon the back of the postal card that I vote for the treaties.

"I have a great respect, Mr. President, for the opinions of my constituents. I am perhaps more ready than the average Senator to recognize the power of public opinion when it is a real public opinion and the right of my constituents to command my vote to meet their views, and I pay as much attention when I receive a communication in the cramped, trembling hand of a farmer as I would to a communication dictated in the office of a banker or a business man; but I do not bow to a public opinion aroused in this artificial way, simply by the use of money, to carry out a purpose to make a false union, a real alliance between the United States and Great Britain."

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., 2d sess. (Jan. 18–Feb. 14, 1912).]

"IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
"February 8, 1912.

NOTE.—Senator Works (California) having said that Senator HITCHCOCK is afraid that the arbitration treaties between England and the United States then pending before the United States might lead to an alliance between Great Britain, France, and the United States, Senator HITCHCOCK replied as follows:

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think if the Senator from California will recall what I said in that connection he will realize that I did not simply express my own fear that these treaties, if entered into, would lead to an alliance between Great Britain and the United States. What I did was to quote from the speech delivered by Sir Edward Grey, the minister for foreign affairs in Great Britain. In that speech Sir Edward Grey made the distinct declaration that these treaties, if entered into, would probably lead to such an arrangement between the United States and Great Britain that if either nation were attacked or brought into conflict with another power having no arbitration treaty, the other nation would support it.

"The interpretation I placed upon what Sir Edward Grey said was the very obvious interpretation that if these treaties were entered into and Great Britain should have the anticipated trouble with Germany, the United States would be expected, from the English point of view, to come to the assistance of Great Britain.

"That was not simply my own fear. It was the interpretation placed upon these treaties by the secretary for foreign affairs of Great Britain, not in an interview nor as a matter of rumor but in a reported speech in the House of Commons. And I said that if Great Britain were entering into these treaties with that understanding of their ultimate result, it was something which we in the United States, who want no entangling alliance, should take into account very seriously."

QUOTATIONS FROM THE SPEECH OF SENATOR HITCHCOCK ON THE ARBITRATION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 1, p. 646, etc., Jan. 4, 1912.]

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice that I would claim the attention of the Senate to-day for some remarks on the pending arbitration treaty proposed to be ratified between Great Britain and the United States. Throughout the country for some time there has been a growing agitation which has enlisted the interest of many of the good people of the United States, but an agitation, Mr. President, which has apparently been carried on without much of an effort to enlighten the people as to the facts in the case. The sole object seems to be to create, artificially if necessary, a public sentiment in support of ratification.

"There has been a good deal of a disposition on the part of orators who have appeared before various public meetings, and on behalf of writers who have put forth their printed arguments, to arrogate to themselves a monopoly of the particular custody of the dove of peace, a disposition to assume that they, and only they, favor the idea of the peaceful settlement of international differences. The people have been led to believe that unless they aroused themselves to influence the Senate of the United States to ratify these treaties in the exact form that they come from the State Department and the President, without the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't,' we would probably be involved in hostilities with Great Britain."

[Mr. HITCHCOCK then goes on to say that the United States already has an arbitration treaty with England so broad that "both countries have agreed to arbitrate all differences which may arise between them, except those involving national honor, vital interests, or third parties. He explains that the then pending new arbitration treaty proposes to arbitrate all differences in the future that are justiciable, and that justiciable means those questions which may be settled by recognized principles of law or equity. He criticizes this in the following words:]

"The pending treaty, however, does not leave the decision of what is a justiciable difference to the President and the Senate. It creates a joint high commission and empowers this joint high commission of six members to decide what questions are justiciable and what are not justiciable. It provides that any five of the six members of that commission may decide the question. It authorizes three members appointed by the President to decide on the treaty's interpretations for the country, and that, to my mind, is the objectionable part of this treaty. That is the trap in the treaty. It is the open door to future troubles in the treaty.

"We are told that it is perfectly constitutional for the Senate of the United States to ratify this treaty, and thus abdicate for the future its right to pass upon the application and rule on the interpretation of the treaty. Mr. President, it may be constitutional, but I do not think it is wise, because I believe it will involve us in future trouble. I do not believe it safe, because I believe it will embroil us in innumerable international difficulties in the future in the application of the treaty.

"It certainly is not American. There is at the present time, and has always been, this radical difference between the treaty-making power of the monarchies of Europe and the treaty-making power of the United States: In the United States the President can not make a treaty and have it approved and executed by his Cabinet or appointees after the European fashion, but he is required, under the Constitution, to submit it to the Senate for its ratification. That is the American idea. It is the American idea that the representatives of the people shall have a voice in the ratification of a treaty; but if this proposed clause of section 3 becomes a part of this treaty that difference disappears, as far as our relations with Great Britain are concerned. Hereafter the interpretation of that treaty and the application of it pass from the hands of the Senate into the control of a commission, whose American members are appointed by the President of the United States. They can interpret the treaty; they can widen the treaty; they can apply the treaty; and, appointed as they are by the President, they will express, undoubtedly, the President's views without any restraint from the Senate of the United States. So, instead of having an American plan, a democratic plan, to control our international relations by representatives of the people, we will have a monarchical plan, under which the President will practically be able to treat directly with responsible ministers.

"But, Mr. President, there is another objection to this particular clause of the treaty which creates this joint high commission. It will involve us in an entangling alliance with Great Britain.

"I have a great admiration, Mr. President, for the British people, but I am not in favor of departing from the old American ideas of isolation. I do not believe in an entangling alliance with any country, and I believe it is capable of demonstration that this treaty is regarded in England, at least, as the first step toward an English-American alliance.

"Mr. RAYNER. Will it place us in an entangling alliance with France?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I have purposely avoided the discussion of both of these treaties, for the reason that I feel that the initiative in this matter is in Great Britain; I feel that there would have been no treaty with France if it had not been preceded by a treaty with her close ally, Great Britain; and I am discussing only to-day the proposed treaty with Great Britain because I have made more of a study of its effects, its dangers, and its inspiration.

"Mr. President, I have made the statement that this is the first step in a possible entangling alliance of the United States in the policies of Great Britain. Possibly I have made that statement too strong; possibly I should merely allege what I can prove, which is that in Great Britain it is regarded as the first step in such an entangling alliance. To prove my assertion, let me read from a speech by Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons, delivered last March. The President of the United States has recently quoted Sir Edward Grey as an authority in expounding British sentiment and British ideas on this question, and I think I may, therefore, well be excused if I also quote from a speech of Sir Edward Grey, the British secretary of state for foreign matters. Speaking on a proposition to reduce the English Navy and giving the reasons why the Government could not consent to it, he drifted into a comment upon the relations between the United States and Great Britain. After quoting with approval some statements of President Taft, he came to a consideration of the proposed arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain. In the course of his remarks he used this language:

"But supposing it took place, and two of the greatest nations in the world were to make it clear to the world that by agreement such as that, that in no circumstances were they going to war again, I venture to say that the effect on the world at large of the example would be one which would be bound to have beneficial consequences. It is true that the two nations who did that might still be exposed to attack from a third nation who had not entered into such agreement. I think it would probably lead to their following it up by an agreement that they would join with each other in any case in which one only had a quarrel with a third power by which arbitration was refused.

"Mr. President, that language is peculiarly significant. Coming at a time when the relations between Great Britain and Germany were strained—as, to some extent, they still are strained—coming from the secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, and having particular reference to the treaty with the United States, can we put any other interpretation upon that language than to say that, in the opinion of Sir Edward Grey, if the treaty were made between Great Britain and the United States, and Germany refused to enter into such a treaty of arbitration and had a quarrel with Great Britain, the next natural step would be for the United States and Great Britain to join each other against Germany? There is no other possible interpretation which can be placed upon the speech of Sir Edward Grey. It is in accord with a widespread desire in Great Britain for an alliance between the United States and Great Britain. That this desire is harbored also by many people in the United States may be true; but it is certainly not the American idea, and it is certainly not in accord with the traditions of this country. It is evident that this speech, so interpreted, affords ample ground for the belief that England, for her own purposes, desires this treaty as the basis for an alliance in the future with the United States. We certainly want no alliance with any country, and must avoid becoming so involved.

"Mr. President, it is evident also that this treaty, instead of guarding against differences between this country and Great Britain, is likely to lead to controversy. We have already heard in this country enough dispute on the interpretation of the clause creating the joint high commission to indicate that it is involved in doubt.

"The distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has recently published a small document, which he has distributed undoubtedly to all Members of the Senate, in which he argues that while the joint high commission has the power in the first place to decide what questions are justiciable, yet the Senate can exercise a restraint over the joint high commission and can modify or nullify its act by refusing to give consent to the agreement which must be made for each specific case before it is submitted to arbitration. That of itself is an argument against the creation of the commission. It involves a doubt. It is likely to place the Senate of the United States in a position where it must either recognize the authority of the joint high commission and accept its interpretation, however obnoxious, or it must repudiate the decision of the joint high commission and leave us open to the charge of bad faith in entering into this treaty; in other words, the provision giving the joint high commission that power is either a danger or, as the Senator from Mississippi would argue, it is a humbug. In either case it is likely to involve us in future controversies as to its interpretation.

"Mr. President, anyone looking into the future, I believe, must admit that if this treaty as it comes to us is ratified by the Senate and goes into effect, Great Britain will have ten times the number of demands upon us for arbitration of questions in which she is interested as the proponent that we will have upon her. That is the natural course of events. Her interests are such, her policies are such, that she will be constantly seeking to restrain us and interfere with the American policies of this country. For that reason I think this country would be unwise to put itself, by an ironclad and practically unlimited treaty, in the position of promising to submit everything to arbitration that is justiciable, and then to leave the question of justiciability to a mixed commission, whose three American members are appointed by the President and responsible only to him. The interests of the country will be safer in the care of the Senate, and its restraint on the President should be maintained as provided in the Constitution.

"Mr. RAYNER. This treaty does not leave everything that is justiciable to the commission. That is not the language of the treaty.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think——

"Mr. BORAH. Then, Mr. President, what is the exception?

"Mr. RAYNER. The exception is found in the clause 'in accordance with the principles of law or equity'—justiciable in accordance with the principles of law or equity.

"Mr. BORAH. That is simply the definition of 'justiciable' as put in the treaty.

"Mr. RAYNER. Not at all. I disagree with the Senator from Idaho on that point. The language of the treaty is 'in accordance with the principles of law or equity.'

"Mr. BORAH. No; susceptible of settlement in accordance with those principles.

"Mr. RAYNER. No; the word 'settlement' is not used there, as I think the Senator will see if he will look at the treaty. To say 'everything that is susceptible of being treated according to the principles of law and equity' is one thing, and to say that 'a thing is justiciable' is another. Things may be justiciable but take a broader range than controversies that must be decided according to the principles of law or equity. The phraseology 'in accordance with the principles of law or equity' is a limitation upon the word 'justiciable' and does not enlarge it. I merely suggest that, if the Senator will permit me. That is one of the arguments I have made in my minority report, and I do not care to enlarge upon it.

"Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator got the treaty before him?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have it here.

"Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from Maryland as to the interpretation of this particular clause gives added force to what I have said, that it is proposed here to adopt a treaty and to incorporate in it a new idea concerning which there must inevitably be differences of opinion. I will quote, however, in order to make my remarks understandable, the exact language of the treaty at this point.

"Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, let me say one word to get down to the particular point. My proposition is that neither the Monroe doctrine, nor the immigration laws, nor territorial integrity, nor the indebtedness of the States, for which the United States is in no way responsible under its Constitution, could come under any definition of equity that you could give. Those questions could not possibly arrange themselves under the definition of 'law or equity.' I thought I would take the liberty of stating that to the Senator, because that is my position in the minority report I have made to the Senate.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no doubt that is the position taken by the Senator from Maryland, whose views are generally clear and decided, and I have no doubt also that other gentlemen, perhaps equally eminent in the law, might differ from him.

"Mr. RAYNER. There is no doubt of that.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that difference presents one of the reasons why the creation of this proposed irresponsible commission to decide these delicate and dubious points is a matter of bad policy for the United States. The safe plan is to leave their interpretation in the hands of the Senate, which represents the people of the United States, and not to intrust them to three unknown Americans, whom the President upon occasion might appoint. But to quote——

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, if he desires.

"Mr. BORAH. I wish to quote the exact language of the treaty, if the Senator is not going to do so.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had intended to do so, but I will be very glad to have the Senator from Idaho do it.

"Mr. BORAH. Article 1 reads:

"All differences hereafter arising between the high contracting parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity.

"The application of legal or equitable principles is the simple definition put in there of the word 'justiciable.'

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator from Idaho for interjecting at this point the exact language of the treaty, which, I think, I gave in substance before.

"But to resume, I think if we look over the history of the United States in recent years we will conclude that we are in more danger from the diplomats of Great Britain than we are from her dreadnoughts, and I object to any treaty which is likely further to complicate the relations between the countries and which is likely to open the door to further diplomatic concessions of an international nature.

"We are now at work upon the great enterprise of constructing the Panama Canal. What was the greatest obstacle that we met in undertaking that enterprise? It was not of a physical character. Neither mountains nor rivers nor any other physical obstacles were our greatest obstacle. The great obstacle we encountered in that enterprise was the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, in which the United States had become entangled with Great Britain by concessions which should never have been made and which remained for years to plague us an obstacle to that great work.

"Even in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which succeeded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and which was a great advance and a great improvement over it, we still find obstacles and difficulties of the present day which may well serve to warn us that British diplomacy has dangers which we may well avoid.

"We think we have a right to fix the tolls upon the vessels that go through the Panama Canal. Yet the reading of that treaty may well raise serious doubts on this side of the ocean, while upon the other side of the ocean to-day we know claims are made that we have not the right to fix those tolls so as to give a preference to our own vessels. We think we have a right to fortify the Panama Canal and the only restraint or limitation upon it is to be found in the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and found in still stronger language in the treaty which it superseded, made in 1850. Many serious questions involved in the future of the Panama Canal are bound to confront our country, and they will be presented to this country by Great Britain. Are we, under these circumstances, proposing to submit the interpretation of the treaty to three Americans, nominated by the President and associated with three British commissioners, rather than to have it remain where it has remained for all time—in the Senate of the United States—and where the Constitution intended it should remain?

"Mr. President, I have already consumed more time than I had intended. I desire to say, in conclusion, that I am in favor of arbitration. I am in favor of the peaceful settlement of disputes. I am in favor of the pending treaty, providing the last portion of article 3, which empowers the joint high commission to supersede the Senate of the United States in the interpretation of treaties, is stricken out; and I also favor some declaration in the resolution of ratification that we except specifically from future arbitration such questions as involve our permanent national policies or such questions as relate purely to matters of American government."

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is it not possible to come to a vote to-night? Does not the Senator think we could take a vote to-night?

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to taking a vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Harding	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Harris	Moses	Smith, Md.
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Henderson	New	Spencer
Colt	Hitchcock	Newberry	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Dial	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Dillingham	Kenyon	Owen	Townsend
Edge	Keyes	Penrose	Trammell
Fall	King	Phelan	Underwood
Fletcher	Kirby	Phipps	Wadsworth
France	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	Lenroot	Robinson	Warren
Gerry	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Gore	McCormick	Shields	Williams
Gronna	McCumber	Simmons	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session now for something more than seven hours, devoted entirely to the treaty. There are some other Senators who wish to speak briefly on this amendment. It seems to me not unreasonable that we should take a recess at this time until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEWBERRY in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Until the disposition of the pending amendments I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina]. He has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I announced that I was paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. He has not voted, but I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and let my vote stand.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] which I transfer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] are necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, they would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. SMITH] are detained on account of illness in their families.

The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is detained on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 36—as follows:

YEAS—43.

Borah	Gronna	Lodge	Poindexter

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 28, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 27, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we rejoice with the high minded and patriotic American citizen that we are permitted to live under a Government of the people, by the people, for the people, which our fathers sacrificed their lives and fortunes to establish.

Now we are threatened with a crisis which defies our Government and would overthrow its sacred institutions, inaugurated by a few hundred thousand people and bring about untold misery, sorrow, grief, and even death, to the one hundred and ten millions involved in an unwarranted dispute between labor and capital.

Interpose we beseech Thee with all the strength of Thy holy influence and so move upon the minds and hearts of those engaged in the contest, that law and order may obtain and peace and happiness reign in our midst, through Him who lived and died that love might live in the hearts of men. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, October 25, 1919, was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. ASWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday morning next I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this time.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four or five minutes, to make an announcement concerning a liberty memorial erected to the memory of the American dead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. On what subject does the gentleman desire to address the House?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It is relative to a memorial campaign which opens in Kansas City to-day and closes on November 1, to erect a monument and a building in which will be deposited war relics, and in which patriotic gatherings, such as the American Legion, the Sons of the American Revolution, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and others will be held to the memory of the 403 boys who died from Kansas City.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, that sort of thing is being done all over the country. It is very commendable on the part of the people of Kansas City, and we wish them very great success in their patriotic efforts; but it seems to me we can hardly pause every morning in our work to hear statements of that sort. The gentleman has made his statement, so that the country is now informed in regard to this splendid work.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I am sorry if the gentleman objects to such a holy purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker!

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENTRY OF ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference report on the bill H. R. 9782.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9782, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the conference report will be read.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "and shall continue in force and effect until and including the 4th day of March, 1921"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
H. D. FLOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. C. LODGE,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The agreement fixes March 4, 1921, as the date when the law shall cease to be operative. The House proposal provided that it should continue in force for a period of one year after the date when the act of May 22, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," should cease to be operative. The Senate proposal would have made the law permanent.

JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
H. D. FLOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this conference report is on the passport-control bill, which passed the House about two weeks ago, and which passed the Senate last week.

In the form in which it passed the House, the law was to run for a period of one year after the promulgation of the treaty of peace with Germany, and was then automatically to die. The Senate struck out the limitation in time, so that the effect of the amendment was to make the law permanent legislation. The conferees have agreed to extend the law until March 4, 1921. In other words, instead of having the law run for just a year, as the House had originally proposed, the agreement reached probably means that it will run for a year and two or three months. The advantage in having the life of the law slightly longer than was proposed by the House is this, that it was at least possible that as the bill left the House the law would expire at a time when Congress was not in session. The agreement reached means that Congress will certainly be in session, because the date fixed is March 4, 1921. Furthermore, it gives a little more time for this Congress to work out its policy of permanent control over immigration coming to the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there are no questions——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Other than that, there are no changes?

Mr. ROGERS. The Senate made only one amendment to the bill, and that, as I have stated, related to the element of time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose to adjourn the House on account of the anniversary of the death of former President Roosevelt in pursuance of the national movement throughout the country?

Mr. MONDELL. My own thought was that we would best honor the memory of the man who taught the doctrine of the strenuous life by remaining in session and performing our duty in the transaction of the business before the House. But I am asking these two minutes for the purpose of saying a few words relative to the life and character of this great American.

Mr. GARD. In pursuance of the general policy throughout the Nation, would it not be a proper tribute for this House to adjourn at this time?

Mr. MONDELL. I repeat what I said a moment ago. The very best tribute that can be made to the life, character, service, and teachings of Theodore Roosevelt is to work, to perform the duty that we have before us.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming to address the House for two minutes?

Mr. BLANTON. Under that statement, would it not be a reflection upon the working capacity of other loyal American citizens in whose memory and honor the House has heretofore seen fit to adjourn from time to time?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Because many of the men in whose memory we have adjourned before have been hard working, industrious citizens.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know of any recent case where we have adjourned for an entire day in memory of anyone.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know why other gentlemen can not have unanimous consent to address the House as well as the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires to object to my speaking for two minutes on the subject of Col. Roosevelt, he can do so.

Mr. ASWELL. I just want to ask the gentleman why it is that he can get unanimous consent and not others?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ASWELL. I object.

PROJECTED COAL STRIKE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the text of the statement issued Saturday evening by the President in regard to the threatened coal strike.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter of the President. Is there objection?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know if the gentleman from Wyoming indorses that statement of the President printed in Saturday's paper?

Mr. MONDELL. I do, most thoroughly and heartily.

Mr. BLANTON. And so does every other patriotic American.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

TEXT OF PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT WARNING OF FEDERAL ACTION.

President Wilson issued a formal statement last night with the approval of the full membership of his Cabinet, declaring the projected strike of bituminous-coal miners under present circumstances "not only unjustifiable; it is unlawful." The statement said:

"On September 23, 1919, the convention of the United Mine Workers of America at Cleveland, Ohio, adopted a proposal declaring that all contracts in the bituminous field shall be declared as having automatically expired November 1, 1919, and making various demands, including a 60 per cent increase in wages and the adoption of a six-hour workday and a five-day week; and providing that, in the event a satisfactory wage agreement should not be secured for the central competitive field before November 1, 1919, the national officials should be authorized and instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous miners and mine workers throughout the United States, effective November 1, 1919.

"RECALLS THE WAR AGREEMENT.

"Pursuant to these instructions, the officers of the organization have issued a call to make the strike effective November 1. This is one of the gravest steps ever proposed in this country, affecting the economic welfare and the domestic comfort and health of the people.

"It is proposed to abrogate an agreement as to wages which was made with the sanction of the United States Fuel Administration, and which was to run during the continuance of the war, but not beyond April 1, 1920. This strike is proposed at a time when the Government is making the most earnest effort to reduce the cost of living and has appealed with success to other classes of workers to postpone similar disputes until a reasonable opportunity has been afforded for dealing with the cost of living.

"It is recognized that the strike would practically shut off the country's supply of its principal fuel at a time when interference with that supply is calculated to create a disastrous fuel famine. All interests would be affected alike by a strike of this character, and its victims would be not the rich only, but the poor and the needy as well—those least able to provide in advance a fuel supply for domestic use.

"It would involve the shutting down of countless industries and the throwing out of employment of a large number of the workers of the country. It would involve stopping the operation of railroads, electric light and gas plants, street railway lines and other public utilities, and the shipping to and from this country, thus preventing our giving aid to the allied countries with supplies which they so seriously need.

"The country is confronted with this prospect at a time when the war itself is still a fact, when the world is still in suspense as to negotiations for peace, when our troops are still being transported, and when their means of transport is in urgent need of fuel.

"WITHOUT APPROVAL OF WORKERS.

"From whatever angle the subject may be viewed, it is apparent that such a strike in such circumstances would be the most far-reaching plan ever presented in this country to limit the facilities of production and distribution of a necessity of life and thus indirectly to restrict the production and distribution of all the necessaries of life. A strike under these circumstances is not only unjustifiable; it is unlawful.

"The action proposed has apparently been taken without any vote upon the specific proposition by the individual members of the United Mine Workers of America throughout the United States, an almost unprecedented proceeding. I can not believe that any right of any American worker needs for its protection the taking of this extraordinary step, and I am convinced that when the time and money are considered it constitutes a fundamental attack, which is wrong, both morally and legally, upon the rights of society and upon the welfare of our country.

"I feel convinced that individual members of the United Mine Workers would not vote, upon full consideration, in favor of such a strike under these conditions.

"INTEREST OF PUBLIC PARAMOUNT.

"When a movement reaches a point where it appears to involve practically the entire productive capacity of the country with respect to one of the most vital necessities of daily domestic and industrial life, and when the movement is asserted in the circumstances I have stated, and at a time and in a manner calculated to involve the maximum of dangers in the public welfare in this critical hour of our country's life, the public interest becomes the paramount consideration.

"In these circumstances I solemnly request both the national and the local officers and also the individual members of the United Mine Workers of America to recall all orders looking to a strike on November 1, and to take whatever steps may be necessary to prevent any stoppage of work.

"It is time for plain speaking. These matters with which we now deal touch not only the welfare of a class but vitally concern the well-being, the comfort, and the very life of all the people.

"I feel it is my duty in the public interest to declare that any attempt to carry out the purpose of this strike and thus to paralyze the industry of the country, with the consequent suffering and distress of all our people, must be considered a grave moral and legal wrong against the Government and the people of the United States.

"LAWS ARE TO BE ENFORCED.

"I can do nothing else than to say that the law will be enforced, and the means will be found to protect the interests of the Nation in any emergency that may arise out of this unhappy business.

"I express no opinion on the merits of the controversy. I have already suggested a plan by which a settlement may be reached, and I hold myself in readiness at the request of either or both sides to appoint at once a tribunal to investigate all the facts with a view to aiding in the earliest possible orderly settlement of the questions at issue between the coal operators and the coal miners, to the end that the just rights, not only of those interests but also of the general public may be fully protected."

REQUEST TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that I may address the House for two minutes in memory of ex-President Roosevelt.

Mr. ASWELL. I object, Mr. Speaker.

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10137, the District of Columbia firemen's bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, pending that will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. Pending that, I should like to see if we can agree upon time for general debate.

Mr. RAKER. Before the gentleman takes that up, will he yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Approximately how long will the District Committee operate to-day, and is it the intention to take up the oil-leasing bill following the disposition of this District of Columbia bill?

Mr. MAPES. We hope it will not take more than two hours to dispose of the firemen's bill. It is the intention to give way to the Committee on the Public Lands as soon as this bill is disposed of.

Mr. RAKER. I will ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the majority leader, if they intend to take up the oil-leasing bill following the District bill?

Mr. MAPES. I say we intend to yield to the Committee on the Public Lands, so that that committee can go ahead with the oil-leasing bill, as soon as we disposed of this one bill.

Mr. RAKER. Is that the intention of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman's statement is correct.

Mr. RAKER. It is intended to call up the oil-leasing bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, if we can agree upon time for general debate, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. The ranking Member on our side is unavoidably absent, but I think 20 minutes on this side will be all we want.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] is a member of the subcommittee which framed the bill. I have had some requests for time on this side, and I ask unanimous consent that the general debate run not to exceed 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] and 30 minutes to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] and 30 minutes by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object, is the debate to be confined to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman did not say so.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman include that in his request?

Mr. MAPES. No; I do not include that.

Mr. SEARS. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill mentioned.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10137, to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this is what is known as the firemen's salary bill. Some time ago, at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as chairman of the District Committee I introduced a bill looking toward the increase of the salaries of the members of the fire department of the District of Columbia. The bill, which was recommended by the commissioners, was referred to a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] was chairman, and after holding hearings a bill proposed by the subcommittee was introduced by Mr. GOULD. That is the bill we are now considering.

This bill proposes to increase the salaries paid to the members of the fire department, and to classify the privates by dividing them into three classes, the same as policemen are divided. It gives the same pay to the privates as was given to the privates in the police department in the police bill, which passed the House a short time ago.

The firemen in the District of Columbia are very much underpaid under any conditions, and especially is that so under the conditions as they exist at the present time. The salary schedule under which they are being paid was fixed by law in 1906. Speaking generally, they have received no increase in pay since that time. Some may criticize this bill as reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia as being too liberal. But in the consideration of that question it must be kept in mind that Washington is the most expensive place in the United States in which to live. We believe the salaries fixed in this bill are none too high.

The firemen are a very high-grade class of men, and it is almost impossible for them to live on their present pay. In fact, a great many of them are obliged to supplement the pay which they receive as firemen by seeking outside employment when they are off duty. Of course, they ought not to be obliged to do that. The Government ought to pay them enough on which to live. This bill seeks to give them enough on which to live and to bring up their families in a proper manner. The subcommittee considered the bill very carefully and reported it to the full committee unanimously, and I hope it will meet the approval of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration H. R. 10137, the District of Columbia firemen's bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 10137, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour—one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, pending his motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour—half the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. DYER. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if I can have 5 minutes.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I have no doubt of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it fitting and appropriate that we should pause in our labors for a moment as an expression of our appreciation of the life, character, and public services of a great American, the anniversary of whose birth is being celebrated throughout the Nation this day.

Just at this period of the world's history and of the Nation's experience events and conditions emphasize the vital importance of certain principles and the absolute necessity of the practice of certain virtues which were peculiarly urged and exemplified in the life, the conduct, and the teachings of this great man.

The world and the Nation needs at this time, above all else, the stern virtues which he emphasized in word and deed. We need the practice of the virtues of the strenuous life, of devotion to duty, of self-sacrifice, and of uncompromising warfare against error in every form. [Applause.]

Above all else, we need that whole-hearted devotion to sound principles of justice and righteousness, and unrelenting warfare against political, social, and economic heresy which we have come to denominate as Americanism, which was so abundantly exemplified in the life, the teachings, and the character of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time a few extracts published in the Washington Post of this morning from the teachings of this great man.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to have read the matter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SOME ROOSEVELT EXPRESSIONS WHICH HIS LIFE EXEMPLIFIED.

I wish to preach, not the doctrine of ignoble ease, but the doctrine of the strenuous life, the life of toil and effort, of labor and of strife; to preach that highest form of success which comes, not to the man who desires mere easy peace, but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardship, or from bitter toil, and who, out of these, wins the splendid ultimate triumph.

In peace and in war we must spend and be spent, in the endless battle for right against wrong; deeds, not words alone, shall save us.

No abundance of the milder virtues will save a nation that has lost the virile qualities.

In the really great man there must be both the heart of gold and the temper of steel.

Courage, hard work, self-mastery, and intelligent effort are all essentials to successful life.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD].

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, the committee to-day has called up the bill H. R. 10137, which is a revision of H. R. 9626. The subcommittee appointed to investigate the question of the pay of the firemen in the District of Columbia held extensive hearings and received and filed in the committee report that is available to the Members of the House, as report 410, the basis which it recommends to the House for the pay of firemen. One or two changes in the present law have been made. At the present time privates serve in class 1 and class 2. Promotion is made from class 1 to class 2 under the present law only when a man in class 2 dies or resigns. The committee recommends a redivision of the members into class 1, class 2, and class 3 on the lines adopted for the police, with a probation of one year in class 1, two years in class 2, and automatically afterwards going to class 3 provided he has served efficiently and satisfactorily three years. The committee recommends that the pay of the firemen and the policemen be identical. This has practically been adopted to-day in most of the cities of the country, but in the committee report, Exhibit B, it shows that in six cities of the country the firemen of the highest grade and patrolmen of the highest grade are paid practically the same salary.

The committee in its report for the information of the House presents as Exhibit A the proposed increase over and above the present basic rates; and it shows the basis of the present personnel as authorized in the last bill of the appropriation for the District of Columbia; no increases in the personnel are provided, but the total additional expense would be $315,940 over and above the present rates.

Were all salaries $2,500 a year or less, the annual bonus in effect until June 30, 1920, of $240 per year would apply.

There was one injustice done in regard to the inspectors, and the committee in this legislation corrects that injustice which is referred to in the hearings. The committee also recommends for the consideration of the House similar provisions as that covered by section 3, page 3, be included, which would provide that no member of the fire department should become a member of any organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of the members any obedience to strike or to cease work.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House why it is that the committee proposes to pay the firemen of the District of Columbia more than they do in Chicago or Detroit or Minneapolis or Boston or Philadelphia, and where they do not have any bonus?

Mr. GOULD. The gentleman in his remarks says that it was deemed the best policy by those in charge of municipal affairs to pay the firemen and policemen the same rates. They both take the same oath of office, and they both are subject to the same examination, both physical and mental, and it is deemed better for the personnel to have the salaries the same.

As to whether or not the District of Columbia shall be authorized to pay better salaries than are paid in Chicago and other cities, that is up to the House of Representatives and the Senate to determine.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will it not be in effect if this bill is adopted in its present form that the highest paid firemen in the District of Columbia will during the next year receive $240 more than any other city in the country?

Mr. GOULD. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, if comparison is made with New York City and, I think, Boston.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice the maximum salary is $1,900, to which is to be added $240 bonus.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The $240 bonus is to be deducted from the amounts in Exhibit B of the report, which would leave $1,660 as the basic salary for the highest paid private.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not say so. It says in the report:

> There is also inserted herewith for the information of the House a statement showing the present salaries that are being paid the firemen of the highest grade in seven cities of the United States, including the proposed new salaries plus $240 bonus for the city of Washington, D. C.

I just wanted to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], if he cares to answer, whether or not they made any comparison between the amount of work and the risk run by the firemen of the city as compared with firemen in the city of Chicago, in view of the fact that you give the firemen here $100 and a $240 bonus, making $340 more than the firemen receive in Chicago, or with the city of Detroit, in view of the fact that you give the firemen here $200 more with the $240 bonus, making $440 more than the firemen in Detroit, or of the city of Minneapolis, in view of the fact that you give the firemen here $214 more with the bonus of $240, making $454 more, or with the firemen of the city of Boston, as to whom $275 more is given here, with a bonus of $240, than the firemen in that city, making $515 more?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken in his premise. There are two lists of figures in the report.

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about the maximum.

Mr. MAPES. But the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MADDEN. I am only quoting from the gentleman's figures.

Mr. MAPES. But the gentleman is not reading all of them. The first table that is given on page 2, Exhibit A, does not include the bonus of $240. The second list of figures, Exhibit B, does include the $240, so that in the consideration of that comparison the $240 should be deducted from the $1,900.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not read that the way the gentleman describes it.

Mr. MAPES. That is correct, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The report of the committee distinctly states otherwise.

Mr. MAPES. No; it does not. If the gentleman will read that full sentence, he will see it does not.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. But I am not through yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GOULD. Then I shall take the one minute for the purpose of answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. The note, as I observe it, says:

> To the above-proposed basic salaries of $2,500 or less will be added a bonus of $240 per annum, now provided for by the law, until July 1, 1920.

Not deducted, but added.

Mr. MAPES. But if the gentleman will read further, the paragraph——

Mr. MADDEN. So that, after all, the statement I made in the beginning is correct.

Mr. MAPES. No; the gentleman is mistaken. If he will read the paragraph immediately preceding Exhibit B, he will see that it says:

> There is also inserted herewith, for the information of the House, a statement showing the present salaries that are being paid the firemen of the highest grade in seven cities of the United States, including the proposed new salaries plus $240 bonus for the city of Washington, D. C., and comparison is made between these salaries and those that are being paid to the patrolmen of the police department of corresponding grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I know of no better or more appropriate place for the announcement which I am about to make than in the Hall and in the presence of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, but before doing so I may diverge to direct attention for the moment to the fact that this is a day which is being memorialized throughout the country as the sixty-first birthday and in honor of one of the greatest Americans who has lived in the history of our Nation. He was a cowboy, author, historian, explorer, statesman, patriot, 100 per cent American, and President of the United States. His was a useful, distinguished, and glorious life, and he will live in the memories and hearts of his countrymen forever—that great American, Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

On this day in Kansas City, a city he loved well and which he so often visited and to which he was always affectionately welcomed, there is inaugurated a campaign to raise a fund of $2,000,000 by private and voluntary subscription by the citizens of our city to build a lasting and enduring liberty war memorial to perpetuate the memory and names of her more than 400 sons who gave their lives in the services of our country.

The memorial will be a monument of dignified proportions, and in connection therewith a building which can be used as a repository for war relics, as a permanent meeting place for all patriotic societies, and for other patriotic purposes.

It will be the loving offering of Kansas City to commemorate through the ages the deathless heroism of her glorious sons who gave their all to their country and to humanity.

The campaign for the $2,000,000 fund commences to-day, October 27, and closes on November 1, and what Kansas City wills to do in that brief period for this great undertaking she will do.

And that splendid memorial in Kansas City, in which will be inscribed the names of her dead, will be a sacred and holy shrine to which not only the fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers and relatives, friends, and fellow countrymen will go to do reverence but to which generations succeeding generations from our country at large, passing through our great gateway city from East to West, from North to South, will stop and go in pilgrimage to pay grateful, loving, and reverential tribute.

I know that other States and communities throughout the length and breadth of our beloved country will also evidence in a similar or in appropriate manner their veneration and love for their immortal dead "lest the ages forget."

Before I conclude, it is apropos to revert to the statement made by the distinguished ex-Speaker and distinguished Missourian, Mr. CLARK, a few weeks ago, that a fund of $5,000 had been proposed by the Kansas City Post for subscription by the people of Missouri to secure a sword and present the same to that widely acclaimed Missourian and general of the Armies of the United States, John J. Pershing. I am glad to announce that the sword is now being handmade in Kansas City of suitable, patriotic, and distinctly American design, and that the fund with which to purchase the same was oversubscribed [applause] by the people of Missouri. This sword, when occasion permits, will be presented to him as a tribute by his home people. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a moment ago the majority leader, Mr. MONDELL, obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of the public statement which the President of the United States issued on Saturday, and which appeared in the papers yesterday, regarding the attitude of the President and his proposed action with reference to the threatened strike in the coal fields. I take it that the majority leader in asking the insertion of this statement in the RECORD gives to it his hearty approval. I believe that both houses of Congress feel that the President in giving voice to the sentiments, in his statement, giving expression to his intention to enforce and uphold the law against both parties to that controversy, is but echoing the sentiments of the American people.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in response to a question, stated that he did indorse everything that was said in that statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi. That is correct. The majority leader did state that. He unreservedly indorsed every sentiment therein stated.

Mr. SNYDER. And along that line I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas if he knows of anyone in the House who does not subscribe to the sentiments therein expressed?

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope that the gentleman is correct. I know of no one and trust there is none, and I rose to suggest to the majority leader that in view of the fact that every Member of the House and Senate does approve the sentiments contained in that statement this body and the Senate should give public and official expression to their views.

And I want to inquire whether or not the majority leader will not later in the day ask unanimous consent to consider a concurrent resolution expressing the concurrence of the two bodies in the views of the President, and in case the gentleman does not I desire to offer later in the day the following concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration:

Concurrent resolution approving the recent statement issued by the President of the United States regarding the threatened strike in the coal fields of the United States and pledging the support of the Congress to the President in the exercise of all his constitutional powers in the premises.

Whereas the President of the United States has made a public statement regarding his proposed course of action with reference to the threatened strike in the coal fields of the United States and his intended efforts to enforce the law and maintain the integrity of the Government of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the utterances of the President of the United States contained in said statement are approved by the Congress of the United States; and that the Congress hereby pledges to the President of the United States its support in all constitutional measures which the President may take in order to enforce and maintain the laws of the United States in their full integrity.

[Applause.]

I am not going into the merits of the controversy, because the President's statement does not go into the merits of the controversy. But if gentlemen will read the President's statement, it is an assertion that the powers of this Government even unto the utmost will be exerted in upholding and maintaining the law. We can not perhaps at this time solve immediately the questions at issue in this controversy, but we can give expression to the country that the stand of the President in this matter has the hearty concurrence of the Congress, and that his determination to uphold the laws whether they be violated by mine owners or miners will be approved and that the violators of law will receive the hearty condemnation and swift punishment of the law enforced by officers of the United States of America. [Applause.]

It is not possible at this time to solve these questions in all their phases, but we must uphold the laws that are already on the statute books and already capable of being enforced; and I trust that a little later in the day the majority leader will consent to the immediate consideration of this resolution. I will state that the acting minority leader has been consulted, and readily agrees therewith. Disaster immediately impends, and may break in a few days; rich and poor, women and children, all classes of the citizenship are threatened with intense suffering in the winter that faces us. Let us assure the country that the President will have our support. This is, and I hope may ever be, a land of law. Whether that law is violated by the rich or the poor, whether by the mine operator or the miner, the law must be upheld and vindicated. The law is supreme. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] that what the President of the United States does mean is that when miners enter into a contract with the coal operators requiring that they will work under certain conditions until the end of the war, not to extend beyond March 1, 1920, that the President of the United States wants them to keep their agreement just like every other person who contracts in this Nation.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret I have not the time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to see a bill like the present one pass the Congress with but an hour's debate without raising one voice against the policy which seems to have been adopted by this House and the Senate, that is of paying to police officers and paying to the firemen, if you please, or their chief officers, the same salary that the governors of nine different States of this Union receive to-day. There are nine governors of nine States in this Union who do not receive but $4,000 a year and we are seeking to pay the chief fireman in this bill the same salary. Not long ago we paid the chief police officer of this District, not $4,000, but $4,500. I have never said a word against the police department since I have been in Congress, having invariably defended it on the floor here against all attacks, but I do want to call the attention of this House to one incident which has happened since the raise in salary and which is a disgrace to the District and to the Nation. One of the finest young women in this land, coming from one of the finest families of the United States, living in my district, is employed in one of the departments here, 2,000 miles away from her friends, and a police sergeant, if you please, whose salary under the provisions of the other bill was raised to $2,100 with a bonus which would make it $2,340 a year, went to her house the other night and said that complaint had been made that a diamond ring had been stolen in that neighborhood and asked her if she did not have a diamond ring, and she showed him a ring on her finger, a ring she had worn every day in the 11 months she has been in Washington; a ring which every one of her girl friends and every man she has worked with in her department has seen upon her finger every day during those 11 months; a ring which I and my wife saw the day she landed in Washington, because we met her and helped to find her a room and a place to eat. This police sergeant scared that young lady nearly to death, and through threats of taking her to the police station, he humiliated her and made her give up her ring that he might take it off to have it weighed. It so happened the party who had lost a ring asserted that her diamond was five-eighths of a carat. This police sergeant, after I got in behind him for the treatment he had accorded this young lady, had her diamond weighed and it weighed over seven-eighths of a carat, or a little under a fraction of a whole carat, and I had him immediately give that ring back to her. Then Saturday she was again insulted by a letter from an inspector, if you please, who gets $2,400 a year and gets $240 bonus, making $2,640 salary, asking that she again return her ring to him last Saturday. If he had asked that girl 10 proper questions he could have found out that the ring he took from her was her property, and yet he humiliated her before her friends and ordered her to come down to his office and bring that ring back again Saturday evening in order that he might make a further examination.

I want to say if this is the kind of service the police department of Washington give to innocent young girls, the very best in our land, who are strangers in Washington, 2,000 miles away from their homes, I say it is a disgrace to this District and a disgrace to this Nation.

We have been raising salaries entirely too high. I for one am going to raise my voice in this House against it and say that we are paying salaries that are entirely too high.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield me one minute in order to answer the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if he does not think that this police sergeant that he has been referring to had not better try to spend more time catching automobile thieves that are infesting Washington?

Mr. BLANTON. They ought to spend their time in catching criminals and not in humiliating poor, innocent girls here in the city of Washington.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman give the names of the officers?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; they were Detective Sergt. Sweeney and Inspector Grant. I give their names because the gentleman asks for them and has the right to know everything I know about it, and I am trying to get both of them to see that this young lady is not to be molested any further; and I called on Maj. Pullman this morning to see that this innocent young girl, who is 2,000 miles away from her mother and home, is not persecuted any more.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at this most particular period of our history, upon the birthday of our latest great American, we are pleased to recall with proud and tender memories his strongest appeal—that every man must respect and obey the law and aid in law's enforcement.

The man who placed character above all else, with certain vision, declared we should be at instant war with a nation which breaks its word upon Belgian invasion and sinking of the Lusitania.

Recalling his words is the best eulogy:

> Not once in a thousand times is it possible to achieve anything worth achieving except by labor, by effort, by serious purpose, and by the willingness to run risk. The persons who seek to persuade our people that by doing nothing, by passing resolutions that cost nothing, and by writing eloquent messages and articles that mean nothing, and by complacently applauding elocution that means less than nothing, some service is thereby rendered to humanity are not only rendering no such service but are weakening the spring of national character.
> Fear God and take your own part.

[Applause.]

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I desire to offer a word in commendation of the resolution that was suggested by my colleague [Mr. CONNALLY] indorsing the statement and position taken by the President of the United States. I believe the time has come when the Congress of the United States should let it be definitely known that they stand for law and order at any cost.

Now, this is a day when we are supposed all over the United States to take up a collection to establish a memorial to a former President. I believe it is estimated that several millions of dollars are thus to be raised and placed in a monument. I desire modestly and respectfully to submit that I believe, inasmuch as ex-President Roosevelt typified virile American citizenship and believed in and preached the doctrine of 100 per cent Americanism, it would be better to use the six or seven million dollar fund which it is proposed to be raised in stamping out Bolshevism and, if necessary, in deporting those foreign believers in and followers of the red flag. [Applause.] This would be a finer monument to the man who has been termed the typical American than any monument of stone or structure that might be erected, no matter how beautiful its form or how polished its surface.

I believe in freedom of speech and freedom of thought in this country. Nobody believes in that more than I do; but when a man comes to this country from some other country—or even when born in this country—and defends the doctrine that if he can not convince by persuasive methods the people of the United States that his doctrines are true he is going to take a bomb or some other sort of missile and force an unwilling people to accept his doctrine, he is unpatriotic, un-American, and an undesirable in this country. [Applause.] And I believe he ought to be deported, along with all the others of his class, and given a chance on some island or somewhere else, where such characters can live together and try out their absurd doctrines on each other, and not be left in a country that has grown great and powerful in recognition of law and constitutional rights.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that the present officers of our Government should do more than they are now doing to get rid of some of these men and to deport those that are now at Ellis Island awaiting deportation?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not care to go into the merits of that proposition. I know the officials of this country are very busily engaged because of the sentiment that is rising in the country at the present time. There is a great deal to be done; they, of course, are not infallible, but I know the officers of the Government are using all their power to destroy this absurd doctrine that has taken root in this country and which some people are foolish enough to believe. It can not be done in a moment, but I think the Congress of the United States by the passage of some sort of a resolution can, instead of criticizing the officials of the Government, show that they back those officials. We have had too much of carping criticism of some of the officials, and not enough of assurance to the effect that we are going to get behind them and see that they are protected in the exercise of their authority in carrying out the laws of this country. The President has declared his intention of seeing that the law is upheld and enforced. We should let him know that we intend to stand behind him and uphold his hands in employing the resources of this Nation to carry out the laws of the country.

Now, I want to add in this connection that it has been announced by various long-haired agitators in this country—and they have preached the doctrine to various groups of citizens in this country—that certain classes of our land should secure guns, should secure bombs, and other means of enforcing their rights. I do not believe in allowing any long-haired agitators to preach any such doctrine in America. [Applause.] I think it is time for this Congress to give notice to the world and to the country in general, and especially to those who are inclined to preach that doctrine, that we do not mean to stand for it.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. PARRISH. Does not the gentleman from Texas think that the passage of a wholesome immigration law, rejecting undesirable immigration, would go far toward stabilizing conditions in this country at this time?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman suggested that, as I agree with him, and intended to mention it in this connection. I want to say that I believe we should have rigid immigration laws that would prevent any man who comes from soviet Russia or any other country and who believes in the doctrine that it is the right of any class or type of people to take over the property accumulation of centuries from entering this country.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not my colleague believe when we catch a man preaching revolution and bomb throwing that instead of deporting him we ought to hang him as high as Haman? That would get rid of him.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am in favor of giving him a speedy and legal trial under our Constitution and laws. To do otherwise and to deal with him in disregard of law would be to adopt his own anarchistic doctrines. The American people can be trusted to see that he is condemned if he deserves to be.

Mr. BLANTON. What do we want to put him off on some other country for?

Mr. JONES of Texas. We have got to deal practically with this proposition. They should be hanged if they commit any overt act, and we have a law which makes provision for doing so.

Mr. BLANTON. And we ought to enforce a law of that kind.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Undoubtedly. However, there is no use of playing to the galleries on this proposition. We have a right to deport them and to prevent their coming into this country under existing laws, and we ought not to delay until the passage of new laws, but should use existing laws. In the meantime we can pass any laws that may be necessary to adequately cope with this situation.

There has never been a time in the history of this Government when so many radical and revolutionary doctrines were being taught as now. These are being taught by men who believe in no flag except the red flag, and in many instances by foreigners, who do not believe in our form of government, if indeed they believe in any government.

I am willing to listen to any man express his opinion and give his views so long as he depends upon reason and persuasion, but when he wants to get a hand ax and a torch and pillage and destroy he becomes worse than a criminal.

When a man is unwilling to abide the wishes of the majority, but insists by processes of treachery and violence upon inculcating the doctrines of force and the saddling of his ideas upon the people through the medium of fear, he becomes a most dangerous character in a free republic.

Under these doctrines a few fanatics, anarchists, and long-haired ignoramuses in Russia have destroyed all property and practically destroyed property rights. Crying for a division of all wealth, all available wealth has been confiscated and wasted, thus exhausting the savings and accumulations of generations. Forgetting that all governments get their essence and life from the consent and support of the governed, they have tried to resuscitate that long-ago-disproven fallacy and heresy that wealth may be created by the passage of a resolution or the decrying of every man of thrift who possess any property. Forgetting that since the days when man lived in the Garden of Eden there has been no wealth production without toil and labor, they have gone to sea in a broken bowl of idleness, and they are too busy with their howling to notice that it is gradually sinking beneath their feet.

May God protect our country from looking on such doctrines with the least degree of allowance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] has seven minutes remaining. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in addition to the statement of the chairman of the committee, that as to the question of the raise in salary of these firemen the committee, as I understand it, was unanimous upon the schedule reported in this bill.

I was impressed particularly with one line of evidence which was not exploited, but which I caught as the hearings proceeded in taking the testimony of the firemen, and that was the evidence that the men are practically on a par as to living expenses with the policemen. About 11 men testified. It struck me rather forcibly that not a single man of the 11 was able to employ or did employ a servant in his family, with one exception. That man had lost his wife, and had to have some one to take care of his children.

I think these salaries recommended by the committee are very moderate indeed, and barely sufficient to enable a man to maintain himself in respectability, as the firemen of Washington should do.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there any provision in this bill that permits the fireman to have one day out of seven that he spends at home, or is he compelled to remain on duty by the fire department for seven days?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I think there is no exception. He has to be there 12 hours in a day and 30 days in a month.

Mr. BEE. They have a different shift, then?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Very well.

Mr. BEE. This provision in reference to strikes, is that parallel with the provision in the policemen's bill which we passed the other day?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. It is in the same language, I will say to the gentleman. We considered that that could probably be better worded, but the House had voted for it and understood its meaning, and the men involved understood its meaning. We think our distinguished friend from Illinois about hit the nail on the head when he said that "affiliated" covered the thing we were aiming at.

Mr. BEE. There is another thing that I want to ask the gentleman about, and that is with reference to the word "claims"—"an organization affiliated with another organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right." To hold and exercise a right, I understand. What is the special significance of the word "claims" unless it is an existing fact? The mere fact that a man claims something would not be of any validity unless he holds to it as a right and exercises it.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. That matter no doubt will be taken up fully——

Mr. MONDELL. This entire matter was discussed in the House at very considerable length on another bill. This is the exact language, and the House agreed to the language of the committee.

Mr. BEE. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I asked the question if the language was the same, and I was told that it was not, but that it was substantially the same.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the language is identical.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. The language is identical.

Mr. BEE. I asked that question and was told that it was not.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, since the question of the coal situation has been injected into this discussion, although I did not intend to say anything about it, I wish now to say something on that. The gentleman from Illinois asked a question in regard to whether the miners of Illinois were paid only $75 a month. I hold in my hand a statement of the pay of miners. I assume that these are the best-paid miners. I am going to take the risk of trespassing upon the patience of the House to read a few of the items. These men work in a non-union field. They are supplied with coal in their houses. They are supplied with a house with oak and parquet floors. Here is the account of Sidney Deskins, of Borderland, W. Va., for March, 1919. His gross receipts were $271.97, and after taking out his expenses the balance due him was $216.97. In the case of James Jones, his total for the month of March was $251.96 and his net was $190.96. That takes out his doctor's bill and his light and, in some cases, his insurance.

Mr. KITCHIN. His house rent and light?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes; house rent and light. Here is the account of Harry Pinson. For the month of March his total was $388.44, and his net was $240.94. Harrison Crum, total $420.70, balance or net $417.45. He is a single man. He did not pay any rent.

Mr. BLANTON. That is more than many Government officials receive.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. A. Zimmerman, sr., total for the month of March, 1919, $421.74; net, $336.24.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. What kind of duty was that man engaged on?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. He is mining coal by the ton on the car.

Mr. CARSS. Is he a pick miner or does he work a mining machine?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. All he has to do is to put in his little blast and load the coal on the car.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What are his hours?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Seven hours; not over eight.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Have you any account of the number of hours he worked to earn that $421.74?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I have not. April, 1919, Sidney Deskins, total, $344; net, $300.50. Account of A. Zimmerman, sr., April, 1919, total, $250.04; net, $113.04.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. May, 1919, Sidney Deskins, total, $390.03; net, $336.53.

Mr. MADDEN. The deduction of the house rent and electric light and things of that sort really ought not to be made, because the net earnings of an ordinary man will be what he gets, out of which he must pay his rent and other expenses.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. All that he pays out of this is his smithing and powder bill. His powder bill is $2.50, and his rent is $9, and he pays for the blacksmithing of his tools. All the tools he needs are the pick and shovel and auger, and 50 cents a month is charged for keeping his tools in order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand some deductions were made for store account, scrip, in some cases amounting to $49.

Mr. MADDEN. I say it is not fair to say "net," as the amount he receives after paying his grocery bills and lights and other things. It ought to be confined only to his powder bill and tools.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. His insurance is taken out.

I give the statement, which has been furnished me, as to wages earned for the months indicated for the miners named at the Borderland Coal Corporation mines at Borderland, W. Va.

This is not a union field, but my understanding is that prices corresponding to the union scale are paid. Mining conditions are not exceptional, and the miners are not paid higher, or at least not materially so, and the mining conditions are materially no better for the miner than generally prevail in that field. Miners are charged $2 per month per room for frame houses, most of which have bathrooms attached and are sewered, and $3 per month per room for brick houses. They pay for their own powder, which runs from $2 to $9; smithing bills, 50 cents per month; furnish their own tools, consisting of shovel, pick, coal auger, and perhaps an iron bar. They are not charged for timber or propping. Single men pay 75 cents for medical attention, and married men, with families, $1.25 per month.

It may be that a few of those listed below are contract miners; that is, they employ a helper and receive pay for the coal the miner and the helper both mine. The coal is cut at the footing by the company with cutting machines. The miner works as many hours as he chooses and is paid by the ton or car. Their average day is from seven to eight hours, but, of course, during the period shown by the following statement there were quite a number of days in which the miners were not working owing to car shortage. These cases may be exceptional, but are sufficient to show what can be earned by the steady miner. The list is as follows:

The net is after deducting store account, scrip account, powder, rent, light, coal, smithing, doctor's fee, insurance, and in some instances cash and war campaign fund. These men are not starving.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I think it would possibly be interesting to the House to extend my remarks by inserting these figures and the extent to which these men are paid.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks in the manner indicated?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if it is to be an extension of the gentleman's own remarks, I will not object. If it is the interpolation of other matter, I do object. I do not object to the extension of the gentleman's own remarks.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is all I am asking for.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on account of the apparent crisis in the sugar-supply problem I think it proper to give the House certain information I have collected, and especially some information that Subcommittee No. 3 of the Special Committee on Expenditures of the War Department obtained while recently in France. Much is being said now about the facts we gave out concerning the bulk-sales contract of property in the hands of the War Department in France. During the short time I have the privilege of the floor I would not attempt to go into the bulk-sales contract, except in so far as it may throw light upon the sugar question. Soon after this committee returned from France, where, as a part of its duty, it had investigated the activities of the liquidation commission, we gave out the statement that there were 22,000,000 pounds of sugar sold to France under the bulk-sale contract. Soon after that, in a speech in the other branch of this Congress, this bit of information was referred to, and I see in one of the Washington papers a statement by the Secretary of War which I understand to mean that he denied that any sugar had been sold there. I again went over the figures obtained from the inventories and invoices obtained from the liquidation commission and ascertained that the figures were substantially correct and that approximately 22,000,000 pounds of sugar was a part of the enormous quantity of food supplies sold to France under the bulk-sale contract, which was inventoried by the liquidation commission as amounting in all to something more than $259,000,000, and which was delivered to them in the month of August of this year.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. In one statement the gentleman made he said there were 22,000,000 pounds sold and now he has just said that there were $22,000,000 worth sold. I should like to know which it is?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Twenty-two million pounds.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman speaks about giving away sugar in France. Is the gentleman entirely accurate? I understand we got 2 cents a pound for it or are to get 2 cents a pound when the debt is paid.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is very difficult, indeed, to say what we got for that sugar. Personally I do not think we got anything for it. It is included in a $400,000,000 bulk or lump sale, of which $259,000,000 was the inventoried price of the food. Mr. Hoover said it was all good. It was worth more than it was when it was purchased. There were $315,000,000 of automobiles, appraised value, also $323,000,000 worth of clothing and textiles, to say nothing of the 10,000 different things included in the total of almost $2,000,000,000. They sold it for $400,000,000. So it is hard to determine what was received for the sugar. But I do not care what they received for it. It ought to have been brought back home, and the director of sales, Mr. Hare, promised me that when he went over there to sell this stuff he would bring this food back home, in order to reduce the cost of living here. But Mr. Hare was pulled off the boat when he started for France, and finally he was put back on the boat, and when he arrived in France with a great corps of experts he found nothing to sell, because the War Department had sold everything that was in France at this sacrifice sale. He maintained his organization there until he resigned a few days ago, for the purpose of finding buyers in Europe for the things we had to sell in America.

Later, when the Harriman National Bank published a statement containing these facts, Secretary Baker felt compelled to make another statement, part of which is as follows:

> The material was a miscellaneous assortment of removable and nonremovable property. A very large amount of the property, it should be said, was brought home and was not sold. What was left was what was not needed in this country and was of such a character as not to justify the expense of transporting it to the United States. If the whole had been brought home it would not have had any appreciable effect on the high cost of living. I approve of what the liquidation commission has done.

Now, gentlemen, 22,000,000 pounds of sugar in no sense represent the total amount of sugar sold and given out from the American Army supply, to say nothing of the enormous amounts of sugar that have been, by Mr. Hoover's activities and the activities of the Sugar Equalization Board, exported to Europe. If you have read the hearings in the Senate you will find that the sugar situation in America is a distressing one. Large consumers of sugar, in order to keep from closing down their plants, are paying as high as 20 cents per pound. In many places you are already being rationed and in some instances it is impossible to get sugar at all. From the testimony before the Senate committee it is apparent that the shortage of sugar is to become more pronounced in the immediate future. The Sugar Equalization Board, through its representatives, Messrs. Glasgow and Zabriskie, testified that the representatives of the Cuban sugar producers early in August notified the Sugar Equalization Board that they were open for proposals for the Cuban 1920 crop. The Sugar Equalization Board being the creatures of the President of the United States, and he holding the $5,000,000 stock subscribed by the Government in this corporation, felt that they should not act in negotiating for this crop without the consent of the President. On the 14th day of August the Equalization Board requested the President to authorize them to acquire the 1920 crop, but for some reason action was not taken by the President, and on the 22d of September the request was renewed upon the President for consent. On the 27th of September the offer of the Cuban producers was withdrawn, and it is very difficult to say whether we will be enabled, at any price, to obtain any considerable portion of the Cuban 1920 crop. But one thing is definitely certain, and that is that we will not be able to obtain it now in competition with the countries of the world at any reasonable figure. I desire to quote from the testimony a few lines with reference to the cause of the shortage of sugar and what could have been done to have prevented it.

The CHAIRMAN. As a legal proposition, who would have the authority now to place an embargo on sugar?

Mr. GLASGOW. To-day?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; some one has that authority.

Mr. GLASGOW. The War Trade Board would have the authority.

The CHAIRMAN. But that has not been done.

Mr. GLASGOW. It has not, so far as I know. We asked for it in July in a letter which Mr. Zabriskie exhibited here at the last hearing, and it has not been done. It is a useful thing.

I desire to insert into the RECORD a letter received from the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), addressed to me on October 22:

Hon. OSCAR E. BLAND,
Member Committee on Expenditures, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your wire to Mr. Hoover, which was forwarded to us, we have wired you as follows:

"Your wire to Mr. Hoover in regard to sale of Government sugars to Europe referred to us. No Government sugar sold to Europe. Refined sugar exported for account royal commission, 126,314 long tons in 1918; 339,338 long tons January to October 1, 1919."

We have no information here of any sugar sold directly by the United States Government to the countries of Europe, but we do know the amount of sugar that has been exported from the United States. The sugar exports from the United States consist of two distinct units. First, the sugar which is sent to Europe and other foreign countries from our own supply; second'y, the sugar which belongs to the English Government sent here to be refined. English sugars have amounted to 339,338 long tons for the period January through September, 1919.

The sugar exported from our own supply has amounted to 154,073 tons for the same period, making a total of 493,411 tons leaving the United States. These sugars were sent by individual refiners under the supervision of the Sugar Equalization Board, but were not sold by any Government agency.

Yours, very truly,

U. S. SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD (INC.),
Statistical Department,
By JOSHUA BERNHARDT.

You will note that there has been exported by this corporation, which is run by the Government, 493,411 tons of our own sugar. Mr. Hoover, of the Food Commission, informed me that the only figures he had available on the sugar question were those showing the amount shipped from this country to Europe to be used in connection with his activities there, which figure he placed at the sum of 3,800 tons.

The Sugar Equalization Board, if they continue their task of equalizing the distribution and price of sugar, will be required to seek additional legislation from Congress. They insist that it will be necessary, if they function properly, that they have the power to place an embargo upon the exportation of sugar, and that they should continue to have the right to distribute and fix the price of raw and refined sugar. They state that it will require for American consumption 4,000,000 tons per year, which is approximately 80 pounds per capita for every person in the United States. The Equalization Board says there is a shortage of sugar to meet this demand. It is contended by others that there is plenty of sugar in the United States. One thing we do know—it is not being handed out to the public if we have it, and the price is becoming threateningly high.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman says that the Equalization Board say that America needs 4,000,000 pounds a year. Did he mean 4,000,000 pounds or 4,000,000 tons?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The Equalization Board say we need 4,000,000 tons a year.

I have examined all of the available records we have as to the sales of sugar in the War Department. I have made inquiry by cablegram of Gen. Allen, commanding the Third Army, the army of occupation at Coblenz, Germany; I have cabled to Gen. Krauthoff, who has been in charge of the sales department of the American Expeditionary Forces at Paris; I have cabled to Judge Parker, of the Liquidation Commission; I have talked with the Chief of Staff, Gen. March; with the Quartermaster General, Gen. Rogers; with the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell; and The Adjutant General's Department; and Mr. Hoover, of the Food Administration, with reference to information as to how much sugar has been sold of the enormous stock we held in France.

Judge Parker caused to be cabled the following information:

Following sales of sugar have been made during 1919:

	Pounds.
Jan. 28, American Red Cross	180,000
Mar. 16, American Relief Administration	400,000
Apr. 21, American Relief Administration	40,000
June 28, Italian Government	10,000
July 2, American Committee for Relief of Devastated Regions of France	20,000
July 5, Young Men's Christian Association	360,000
Total	1,010,000

Compilations of sales of surplus American Expeditionary Forces property in Europe, arranged by categories as well as by services and names of purchasers, not complete; hence, am not fully prepared to state absolutely that the foregoing constitutes all sugar sold.

I am of the opinion that it constitutes but a very little part of the sugar sold by the Liquidation Commission before it made the bulk sale to France, and, remember, the Liquidation Commission began its activities in February or March, and the Army had been selling sugar since the preceding November. Our committee was furnished by Gen. Krauthoff in Paris a statement showing a partial list of their sales of sugar by his organization prior to the beginning of the activities of the Liquidation Commission. The Sales Department of the American Expeditionary Forces, and no other authority in France, was not able to give this committee a complete detailed statement of the amount of property sold prior to the beginning of the activities of the Liquidation Commission, nor are they prepared to-day to give such statement. Neither the War Department here nor the records in France disclose these facts. I find, however, that some 25 different sales were made to governments, organizations, and individuals which totaled over 9,325,000 pounds of sugar. Mr. Hoover testified before our committee in France that he furnished from the Army supplies a great part of the provisions for which he spent most of the $100,000,000 appropriated by Congress for the relief of starving Europe and that he furnished buyers for the Liquidation Commission, chiefly from the liberated nations, of other great quantities of supplies. It is fair to assume, I should think, in view of the fact that there was a great sugar shortage in Europe and that the American Army had a great surplus supply, that considerable sugar was included in these enormous quantities of supplies sold to the liberated nations and to different philanthropic and rehabilitation organizations of Europe.

I have made inquiries at the War Department, in order to obtain figures as to how much sugar was sold to the Army, so persistently that I probably have made myself somewhat troublesome in that quarter. I elicited a few facts which may be of interest to the House, but which within themselves give very little idea of the amount of sugar sold in Europe. I think it entirely proper that I call your attention to the fact that during the war our patriotic impulses were appealed to in order that we would use but one lump, or no lump at all, in our cup of coffee or tea and that we were restricted very severely in reference to our purchase and use of sugar in order to give the "boys at the front" all they needed. It was a commendable thing to do and Mr. Hoover did his job well in that connection. Our patriotic people responded heartily and made great sacrifices. In the meantime the sugar piled up in France, the armistice came along, our boys came home with the exception of about 20,000 and some 6,000 or 7,000 that are now in Germany, but still the sugar shortage has been staring us in the face for many months, and yet the War Department has gone on heedless of the wants of the American people and even heedless of the wants of their own Army and have given out to Europeans this stock of sugar saved by the American people as recklessly as Santa Clause gives out candy to children on Christmas Eve. I want to insert here a letter from Col. Wood, of the Quartermaster General's Corps, addressed to Gen. Rogers, the Quartermaster General, under date of October 22, 1919.

Memorandum for Gen. Rogers:

1. Attached hereto is a concise statement of events leading up to the present sugar situation.

2. It is now necessary to procure immediately 2,550,000 pounds of sugar, and an additional 9,542,000 pounds to last through the third quarter of the present fiscal year.

3. It is suggested that Col. Point go to New York to-day for the purpose of arranging for this sugar with the United States Sugar Equalization Board.

4. This is the only known source from which the sugar can be obtained, and also the Sugar Equalization Board is morally bound to supply the War Department with its needs.

5. Again, the question of payment for this sugar should be given careful consideration. It is my opinion that the sugar should be returned at the same rate which the Sugar Equalization Board paid our department for the sugar which they took over. Also, inasmuch as the estimates for the present fiscal year were based on a sufficient supply of sugar to meet all requirements, and a shortage has now arisen, due to a portion of it having been turned over to the Equalization Board, the money so secured should, if possible, be made available for the necessary purchase and not turned into the Treasury, a transaction which is liable to leave this department with a shortage of funds requiring additional appropriations.

W. S. WOOD,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps, Director of Purchase.

You will observe in this letter that the Army must have 12,000,000 pounds of sugar to last through the present quarter of this year, and that they are beseeching the Equalization Board to take the sugar away from the consumers of the country and give it to the Army. Not only has the War Department robbed the people of their sugar during the war and then sold it, but they have recklessly disposed of it to the extent that they have none for themselves and must now rob the people again in order to get a sufficient quantity to tide them over. I may be in error and out of sympathy with the spirit of the times in protesting against delivering anything that America has to suffering Europe if needed here, but it does seem to me that the American people at some time are going to demand that somebody in the administration somewhere raise his voice and hand them favors to the exclusion of all others. Aside from the sugar sold in Europe the War Department shipped the following amounts for the Third Army in Germany:

	Pounds.
March, 1919	2,160,000
April, 1919	4,392,000
May, 1919	4,000,000

Making a total of 10,552,000 pounds which went by way of Antwerp and, no doubt, a portion of it and a great amount in addition, from elsewhere, arrived at Coblenz.

We have long since reduced our Army there to 6,000 men. There is no information in France, there is no information in the War Department here, and I can obtain no information from Coblenz, Germany, as to what became of the sugar that went to Coblenz or what became of the sugar that went to Antwerp. I desire at this point to read to you a portion of a letter I received from Secretary Baker, touching upon this most important question, bearing date of October 23, 1919:

Hon. OSCAR E. BLAND,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * * *

I answer the questions, numbering the answers numerically to correspond with the numbers in your letter, as follows:

1. The War Department has no information as to the amount of sugar sold to the French Government by the American Expeditionary Forces or the Liquidation Commission. The supplies included in the sale made by the Liquidation Commission to the French Government were doubtless inventoried to Judge Parker, but those inventories have not been returned to this country, and are part of the records of Judge Parker's office, which will be returned to this country with him or shortly thereafter. The extent to which sugar was a part of these supplies is unknown to anybody else now in the United States. I this morning caused to be transmitted to you a cablegram from Judge Parker in response to a cablegram sent him by you covering sales of sugar, exclusive of the "bulk sales" eliminated from the inquiry in your cablegram.

2. Whether or not any sugar has been sold by the Third Army, or the Army of Occupation in Germany, I have not in this country the means of knowing. The best information I can secure on that subject is from the Quartermaster General, who appeared before you and testified and whose memorandum to me says: "It is not believed that any sugar will be available for sale by the Third Army, as shipments are being made for their use from the United States."

It seems strange to me that the War Department in Washington has no information as to what has been done or is being done by the Army in Germany and the Army in France with reference to selling products that they now find the Army out of and that they must go upon the market and buy at an extortionate figure in order to keep the Army running. Why does not the Secretary know; why does not the War Department have the information as to how much sugar its own Army is selling and has sold? Empty transports come back from France ballasted with sand, sugar at a low figure is sold to Europeans, and our Army goes to the Equalization Board here in America and demands sugar that they are trying to get out to the American people when sugar profiteers are selling to consumers at 20 cents per pound.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why is it that if we sold all this sugar in Europe we could not get any when we were over there? The gentleman was there. I had to use saccharine all the time with the little sugar that we took with us.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am afraid that the gentleman boarded at the wrong hotel.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I admit that I did not board at the Crillon Hotel.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman had put up where the peace commission was stopping he could have gotten all he wanted. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. If I had put up at the Crillon Hotel, where the gentleman from Indiana was, I might have got sugar, but I could not get it at any other place.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that I had no trouble in getting sugar there at the Crillon and elsewhere.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. I desire to ask the gentleman what answer Gen. Pershing gave to the inquiries upon the details of these transactions?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Gen. Pershing was in this country, and therefore I could not get hold of him.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman did get hold of him?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Not on this question in France.

Mr. MAYS. Is it not well known that Gen. Pershing's judgment was the ruling influence in these transactions?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If he did not know any more about sugar than he knew about what was going on at the front, I take it he would not know anything at all about the subject, so I would not ask him about sugar.

Mr. MAYS. Is the gentleman of the opinion that Gen. Pershing did not know what was going on at the front?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I found him 200 miles away when the Battle of Chateau-Thierry was being fought, riding in his woods of 2,000 acres, on the 19th day of July, 1918.

Mr. MAYS. Hunting deer or Germans?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. He was riding in his woods.

Mr. BLANTON. Yet the gentleman voted to make him a permanent general?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I was in France at the time this was done. Did the gentleman from Texas vote to do it?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, I did; and I will do it again, but I would not criticize him afterwards.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I did not have the opportunity to vote, but I am not criticizing anyone for doing or not doing it.

This may be the manner in which the War Department should be run, but I do not believe the sugar consumers of the country think so. I was informed by Gen. Rogers that the available supply of sugar in the United States for our Army was down to 7,151,083 pounds. We must have an Army in the United States of something like 225,000 men and officers. The War Department did furnish me the information that since April 6, 1919, the Army had disposed of 48,236,816 pounds of sugar in the United States, which they tabulated for me, as follows:

	Pounds.
Total to United States Sugar Equalization Board	41,674,216
United States Navy	1,251,000
United States Marine Corps	1,200,000
United States Shipping Board	36,000
Interior Department (Alaska)	72,000
J. Aron & Co., New York (sale)	4,000,000
J. B. La Garde, Anniston, Ala. (celebration for return of soldiers)	3,600

This sugar was sold at the price of 8.79 cents per pound f. o. b. I have been trying to find out who J. Aron & Co., of New York, are who received 4,000,000 pounds, but I have not been able to learn as yet. Mr. Herbert Hoover has promised to be before our committee next Wednesday forenoon to give us the details of the sales of sugar abroad, and I will be glad to furnish the House this information as soon as it is obtained. Judge Parker will be back from Paris within two or three weeks, and if his records can be located I may be able to obtain some additional facts with reference to the quantity sold in Europe. He may also have some information as to the amount sold by the Army since the armistice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided further, That the privates in said department shall be classified as follows: That privates of class 1 shall serve one year on probation, privates of class 2 shall serve two years subsequent to service in class 1, and privates of class 3 shall include all those privates who have served efficiently three or more years. All original appointments of privates shall be made to class 1: And provided further, That the positions of engineer and assistant engineer in said department are hereby abolished, and those members of said department holding such positions and those vacancies existing in said positions at the time this amendment becomes effective shall be transferred to the positions of privates of class 1, 2, or 3, as may be determined by their length of service on August 1, 1919, in the same manner as hereby provided for the appointment and promotion of privates."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of placing in the RECORD figures showing the compensation paid firemen in other cities compared with what is paid in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made the point a moment ago that the present bill under consideration increased the pay of the firemen in the District of Columbia to a point higher than that paid in the city of Chicago. I call attention to the different classes of firemen of Chicago, and compare their pay with the pay carried in this bill. The chief in the city of Chicago gets $8,000 a year, and this bill gives the chief in the District of Columbia $4,000 a year. The deputy chief in Chicago gets $5,600 a year, and this bill gives the deputy chief $3,000. The battalion chief of Chicago gets $3,300 and in Washington $2,400 by this bill. The chief machinist in Chicago gets $3,000 a year and in Washington $2,500 a year. The engineer in Chicago gets $2,088 and in Washington $1,660. The assistant engineer in Chicago gets $1,820 and in Washington $1,650. Privates in Chicago get $1,800 and this bill gives $1,460, $1,560, and $1,660.

The fact is that even with the increase in this bill, even with the $240 bonus additional, there is not a position in Washington Fire Department that will be brought to the point of pay of the Chicago Fire Department, so that it seems to me that the real heart of this question is, Shall we pay the firemen a living wage in this city of Washington, where the cost of living is higher than almost anywhere else in America?

Recently a constituent of mine gave me figures which he had tabulated in an effort to secure the minimum amount necessary for the maintenance of a family in western Pennsylvania. Out of 1,380 families questioned and who gave their budget of expense, he arrived at the total of $1,593 for clothing, medicine, food, education, insurance, light, heat, car fare, rent, recreation, and taxes.

This bill gives approximately that figure. It is an effort to do a worthy thing—provide a living wage for the fire fighters of the District of Columbia. It does not bring the pay up to that of other cities. The bill should be passed as it stands, and its passage will help to show the remedy for some of the questions which are confronting this country to-day. One of the fundamentals of justice is that every worker is entitled to a wage which is sufficient to enable him to maintain his family in comfort, to educate his children, and lay something aside for old age. There is no half-way compromise between justice and injustice. Now is the time to do justice to these fire fighters, and also to show that Congress stands for a living wage for every worker in America.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4 of such act of June 20, 1906, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the salaries of the officers and members of said department herein provided shall commence for the purpose of this act August 1, 1919, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The chief engineer shall receive an annual salary of $4,000; deputy chief engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $3,000; battalion chief engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $2,400; the fire marshal receive an annual salary of $2,400; deputy fire marshal shall receive an annual salary of $2,000; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $1,660; the chief clerk shll receive an annual salary of $2,400; clerk (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter) shall receive an annual salary of $1,660; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $1,900; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,760; sergeants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,700; the superintendent of machinery shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; the assistant superintendent of machinery shall receive an annual salary of $2,000; pilots shall each receive an annual salary of $1,700; marine engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,700; assistant marine engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,660; marine firemen shall each receive an annual salary of $1,460; privates of class three shall each receive an annual salary of $1,660; privates of class two shall each receive an annual salary of $1,560; privates of class one shall each receive an annual salary of $1,460; hostlers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,080; and laborers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,000."

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the word "marshal" insert the word "shall."

Mr. GOULD. This is just to correct the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,500"; on line 22, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,750, not exceeding two in number"; on line 24, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,160"; on line 25, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,760"; on page 3, line 1, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 2, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,000"; on line 3, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 4, strike out "$1,900" and insert "$1,660"; on line 5, strike out "$1,760" and insert "$1,520"; on line 6, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 7, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,260"; on line 9, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,760"; on line 10, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 11, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 12, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 13, strike out "$1,460" and insert "$1,220"; on line 14, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 15, strike out "$1,560" and insert "$1,320"; on line 17, strike out "$1,460" and insert "$1,220"; on line 18, strike out "$1,080" and insert "$820"; and on line 19, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$860."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, of course we all know, but the people in the country do not know it, although, as I say, we know it and the Treasury Department knows it, that each one of these salaries under $2,500 in this bill carries with it an additional $240 as a bonus. Now, the salaries provided for in this bill probably under existing conditions are proper and should be paid, without this $240 bonus added, and my amendment will merely strike out the bonus and permit all salaries except those over $2,500 to be paid according to the maximums stated in the bill and not pay this $240. Now, I called attention a while ago to the fact that we have nine States which see fit to pay their governors only $4,000 a year. For a man to be governor of a State he can not just live along and not make preparation for it in the years past. He must devote years of his life in most cases to prepare himself to hold that position, and in all the other technical and scientific positions in our land men have to prepare for years to hold such positions. A doctor, for instance, has to spend five or six years in special study in order to be prepared to deal out medicine to people when they are sick. A lawyer has to devote years of his life in order to be prepared to represent the rights of the citizen in a courthouse; the teachers and ministers spend years of study in special preparation, and yet we find men who have never devoted a moment of their lives to any special study or preparation for holding special positions receive to-day salaries larger than doctors or lawyers or teachers or ministers or governors of States. I say it is wrong; I say we ought to pay such men a living wage. We ought to place a premium upon the man or woman who devotes years of study in preparing for the ministry of the gospel, who prepare themselves for the life of the physician, for the life of a school-teacher who teaches the youth of the land, for the life of a lawyer, who represents the life, liberty, and property rights of the individual in the courthouse, and for the life of the minister of the gospel; and yet we are paying laborers, without any special preparation in life, salaries higher than all of those positions that I have mentioned. I say it is wrong. I say we ought to stop it. I say some of these days some of us are going to go home and we are going to look our constituents in their faces, the men who pay the bills, and they are going to ask us why we did it, and you can not answer that. Will you then say that "All the rest of the fellows wanted to do it, and, while I did not want to do it, I went with the gang"? You can not merely say, "Look at the RECORD and you will see that everybody voted for it except BLANTON of Texas; he is the only man who got up and said anything against it," and have your people accept that as a reasonable explanation, for then you are going to find out something about these numerous letters I have been getting from your districts approving the very positions I have taken on the floor of this House with respect to these matters. You are going to hear from the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, of course, there is no proper conclusion to be drawn from a comparison of the pay given to governors of the States and to firemen. Firemen have to live on their pay, whereas governors of States, as a rule, do not, especially in those States which only pay $4,000 a year. I would like to read just a word from the hearings on this bill comparing the pay that the firemen receive with the pay men receive in those lines of employment from which the fire department is obliged to get its men. The testimony is that in years gone by the fire department was recruited about one half from the men on the street cars—that is, motormen and conductors—and the other half from fellows outside of the city who came from farms and other places. Now, the testimony before the committee is that at present the fire department is not getting any men from the street car companies, that those companies are paying about 51 cents an hour to the lowest-paid man and the men in the fire department are paid something like 22 or 23 cents an hour. One of the employees in the fire department testified very forcibly:

A man who will come into the fire department, and I like the fire department, for $2.55 a day, who is now getting $6 a day, has not got sense enough to be a fireman.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. I notice in this bill that class 1 firemen will receive $1,460, and with the bonus of $240 that will be $1,700?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman knows, does he not, that in the Post Office Department that even class 6 postal clerks and postal carriers, the most expert clerks in the Post Office Department, stop at $1,500. Now, does the gentleman think that we ought to pass a bill in here and put firemen in class 1 as high as $1,700?

Mr. MAPES. I certainly do. They live in Washington where the expenses are higher than they are in any other place in the United States, and they are a high-grade, fine class of men.

Mr. BLACK. I do not dispute that proposition, but they are Government employees——

Mr. MAPES. And we are paying them no more than—as the gentleman from Pennsylvania here a few moments ago showed—than the firemen are getting in a great many leading cities in the country even after we make the increase which this bill proposes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman contemplate that this $1,700 shall be permanent with the $240 bonus——

Mr. MAPES. The basic salary provided in the bill is to become the permanent salary.

Mr. BLACK. Now, does not the gentleman think that when you come to take off the bonus, which will be in effect a reduction of salary, that the minute you do that you will destroy the morale of the force and that the policy of the Congress now ought to be to pay these men whatever will be paid them as a permanent proposition?

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that the subcommittee, according to my understanding, took up that matter with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and he felt that the exact opposite ought to be done to what the gentleman has said ought to be done, that this bill ought to fix a basic salary—let the bonus take care of the extraordinary condition which exists at the present time and let the policemen and firemen go back to their basic salaries the same as the other employees of the Government will have to do when the bonus is taken away.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem fair for a Member who has really no fire department to support to attempt to say what the wages of a fireman should be in a city like this. Now, a fireman is working at an extrahazardous job. Every time he goes to a fire he does not know, and his family does not know, whether he will ever come back again. His hours are not regulated. If he goes to a fire, he has got to fight that fire until it is out, no matter whether it takes 24 hours or 36 hours. He is out in all kinds of weather——

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Speaking of the mortality of firemen, have you got any authentic figures that will show that the mortality rate of firemen is any greater than that of the railway mail clerks, for instance, in the Postal Service?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I have not any data. I know they are both dangerous jobs. I know something about a fire department, and I know something about how they operate in a large city. They are not like a fire department in a little town, that when the fire alarm strikes and the house is burning, they have to run home to get a red shirt and a fire hat before they go to the fire. They have always got to be on deck in Washington. So far as wages are concerned, I do not believe we can pay them any too much, and I am for the figures that are in this bill as printed.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because I think we ought to take care of the firemen and give them a decent salary on account of the hazardous work and duties they have to perform, and the way they labor to save life and property.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not close debate on this. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, I would like about three minutes.

Mr. BLACK. And I would like three.

Mr. MAPES. I will ask that the debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have heard a great deal of comparison between these salaries and the salaries that some of the States pay their governors. I do not think it is a fair comparison. I saw in the papers the other day where it said an engineer on a locomotive got perhaps more salary than the governor of Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. And eight others.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And eight others. In my State we pay the governor $4,500. That is the salary. That does not mean all that he receives. When I was in the State senate we voted the governor $5,000 for entertainment and maintenance expenses, and we gave him a magnificent mansion to live in at Annapolis; we gave him a fine automobile so that he could look after the road system throughout the State, and things of that kind, and he was even then inadequately paid. I do not believe the salary of any governor, as specified in the constitution or the statute, is what he really receives, and it is not fair to compare the salaries of these firemen who have to pay for the rent of their homes and for everything they purchase for themselves and their families with the salary we provide them. I have seen that comparison used a great deal. It is obviously wrong; it is unfair and unjust, and we ought not to use it on the floor of this House and send it out to the hundred millions of people throughout this country. [Applause.] I hope it will not be done again.

And so it is with some other salaries. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] compares the salaries we are giving here to-day with what doctors and lawyers get. There are but few doctors and lawyers, who amount to anything, who do not make more than $4,000. Otherwise they could not live as the community in which they reside wants them to live. They could not pay the enormous rent they have to pay if they did not get more money than that. In Baltimore city our men make more money than that. They have to do it——

Mr. CARAWAY. How much is the average salary of the ministers of the gospel in this country?

Mr. LINTHICUM. There is no comparison. I saw a statement that the average salary of ministers throughout the country was $400, but everybody knows that any church of any importance in this country pays its minister a fair salary; if not, they should. They know, too, that in those churches where they do not get the large salaries, they have a parsonage, a home; they have many things given to them, and people look out for them in other ways besides paying them the salary.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the gentleman think that is fair in comparison with the salaries paid to ministers?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I say that the ministers do not get money enough.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was not the statement the gentleman made. I think the gentleman ought to stay with his statement.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I say the ministers do not get money enough.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was not what the gentleman said.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Hear me through. I said that the salary they get does not constitute all they get, because they have a parsonage and lots of things, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know they do not, lots of times——

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know what they do in your State.

Mr. CARAWAY. Or in your State, either.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I believe they will take care of them better now, when there is the high cost of living to care for.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I would have no objection to offer to the basic salaries that are fixed in this bill if they were made to take effect on and after July 1, 1920, and until that time the basic salaries and the $240 bonus should only aggregate the rates provided in this bill. I believe in treating all Government employees as nearly as possible with an equal degree of justice, and any fair-minded man is bound to admit that the salary increases in this bill are a good deal more generous than we have given other employees.

I call your attention to the fact that when this law is passed these basic salaries will date from August 1, 1919, and added to the basic salary will be the $240 bonus, which will make the pay of grade 1, $1,700; grade 2, $1,800; and grade 3, $1,900. Present basic salary of firemen of class 1 is $960, and, therefore, the present raise, including bonus of $240, is $740 per annum, and this raise is entirely out of proportion to increases which we have given Government employees.

Now, let me call your attention to this fact, that the salary increases that we have been making for the present fiscal year for other Government employees, so far as I now recall, outside of the Metropolitan police, have been temporary in their nature, and we have taken into consideration the fact that whatever these employees will draw now, even with these temporary increases, will be permanent, because there is not a Member of this House who does not know that nothing will destroy the morale of the men any more than to take off some of this salary after they begin drawing it.

Now, our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have been wrestling with this same salary-increase problem. We realize that the postal employees are having a hard situation to face so far as the high cost of living is concerned, and if we could move on up to the 71 per cent increase in the cost of living—as the Bureau of Labor Statistics has announced it to be—and then move on back when the pendulum begins to sway the other way, we would have a simple proposition; we would all be willing to do it. But we all know, every man on the committee knows, that whenever we fix a salary, even though we give it the name of a temporary salary, it is there permanently, because if we should fix, for instance, the salary of the present grade 1 in the Postal Service at $1,700, including temporary increases which have been given, as you propose in this bill, and other increases in proportion, we know that when we went to eliminate any of the salary we would destroy the entire morale of the Postal Service. Therefore we must be conservative. We must try to be just to the men, and yet take into consideration the real situation of the Treasury and not burden the Treasury with salaries which would be unreasonable.

Now, if Mr. BLANTON's amendment is adopted, grade 1 of the firemen will draw $1,460, grade 2 will draw $1,560, and grade 3, $1,660, and I submit this would be a good, liberal raise over the compensation which they are now receiving. I have no sort of criticism to offer of the firemen of the city of Washington; I am sure they are a high-class, worthy body of men; but I do earnestly believe that we ought not to fix this as a permanent basic salary at the present time, in view of the $240 bonus that is being paid. I think the basic salaries provided in this bill should begin July 1, 1920, at the expiration of the present bonus of $240, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment which has been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I rise to oppose the amendment of my colleague from Texas. In the first place, it is true that the governor of Texas draws only $4,000 a year. There is no greater reflection on my beloved State than to pay its governor only $4,000. Its governor ought to receive $10,000 a year, and it would be reasonable at that.

I want to say a word in behalf of the firemen. The more a fireman is idle, the better it is for his community, because of the lesser danger of fire. But no soldier on the firing line takes his life in his hand when he goes out on the field of carnage more than a city fireman when he goes out to attend a fire. The lives of women and children are in his custody; their lives and their property are in his custody, and the histories of all the cities in this land are filled with accounts of the heroism of the fireman who goes where the danger is the greatest and who sacrifices oftentimes his life and limb and health for our safety.

In answer to the suggestion of my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK] about the postal employees, I say to you frankly that the railway postal clerk out in the line of duty behind an engine is in just as much danger as the soldier on the battle field, and we do not pay him enough. I do not say it is a disgrace, but it is a reflection upon us that we do not compensate the railway postal clerk sufficiently. He is a soldier in the line of duty. We should compensate him so that he can provide for himself and his family in the constant danger in which he is living. We ought to do that; but that is no reason why a fireman should not be properly compensated and enabled to take care of his wife and children so that he and they could enjoy some of the beauties and happiness of home life like the rest of us who are drawing a great deal more money.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] talks about lawyers. There is not a lawyer entitled to a license and who has been in the practice for years who is not making $4,000 or $5,000. If he does not earn something like that amount, then he ought to surrender his license or go to Congress or somewhere else. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the chairman has said, there is a matter that the committee took into consideration and felt we should act upon it, but for the fact that we wanted to put the firemen and the policemen on an equal basis. We considered very seriously giving these firemen some allowance on account of the uniforms which they must provide and which are ruined frequently at fires. We thought perhaps they ought to be furnished with helmets and rubber boots and a certain class of gum running suit, but we eliminated all that, so that the firemen, out of the allowance we give here, which is certainly moderate, have to provide all these things at their own expense.

In reply to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has said, comparing the firemen with the Postal Service men, it may be true that the Postal Service men are not paid enough. I presume they are not. But we should not commit two errors. The fact is that the Postal Service man works 8 hours a day as a rule, but the fireman works 12 hours a day and 30 days a month.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understand they have the three-platoon system in this city?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Two, sir; 12 hours a day for each shift.

Mr. BLACK. Upon that question of compensation, the point I made was not to change the basic law, but I would like to have the gentleman's view as to the effect on the morale of the men when we came later on to take off this $240 bonus.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I think you would make a mistake to make any distinction between these two classes of service. They employ about the same character of men, and those men have about the same living expenses. We have fixed the pay of the policemen, as I think, correctly. I think we should fix the pay of the firemen the same.

Now, as to the $240, that will come off if living conditions come down. If they do not come down, it ought not to come off.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 5, noes 45.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. MADDEN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. In the form in which it is drawn I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment, to wit:

Page 2, line 20, strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,500"; on line 22, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,750, not exceeding 2 in number"; on line 24, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,160"; on line 25, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,760"; on page 3, line 1, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 2, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,000"; on line 3, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 4 strike out "$1,900" and insert "$1,660"; on line 5, strike out "$1,760" and insert "$1,520"; on line 6, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 7, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,260"; on line 9, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,760"; on line 10, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 11, strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,460"; on line 12, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 13, strike out "$1,460" and insert "$1,220"; on line 14, strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,420"; on line 15, strike out "$1,560" and insert "$1,320"; on line 17 strike out "$1,460" and insert "$1,220"; and on line 19, strike out "$1,080" and insert "$820"; on line 19, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$860."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division, and pending the division I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify Members. As many as favor the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 9, nays 222, answered "present" 1, not voting 199, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE RAILROADS.

Mr. SWEET, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, presented a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill S. 641, an act to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, for printing under the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn in honor of that great American, Theodore Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 6 ayes and 102 noes.

So the motion was lost.

MINING OF COAL, OIL, PHOSPHATE, ETC.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2775 provided for in House resolution 358.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same, not subject to preferential lease, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the highest responsible bidder by competitive bidding under general regulations to qualified applicants in areas not exceeding 640 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such bonus as may be accepted and of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production, and the payment in advance of a rental of not less than $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods.

Whenever the average daily production of any oil well shall not exceed 10 barrels per day, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reduce the royalty on future production when in his judgment the wells can not be successfully operated upon the royalty fixed in the lease. The provisions of this paragraph shall apply to all oil and gas leases made under this act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, in line 8, page 53, before the word "twenty," the words "not exceeding," and in line 10, same page, before the word "ten," the words "not exceeding."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 53, line 8, before the word "twenty," insert the words "not exceeding," and in line 10, on the same page, before the word "ten," insert the words "not exceeding."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I assume that this period of leasing has been agreed upon by the committee and probably all leases will be for the full terms of years, but it seemed to me that it would be better to vest some discretion in the Secretary of the Interior, as circumstances might possibly arise which would make it unwise not to make it compulsory to lease for 20 years or not to make it compulsory to lease for 10 years.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to speak for the committee, of course, but it would seem to me that the gentleman is entirely right, and it might be an illogical thing to force the Secretary to make a full 20-year lease.

Mr. WALSH. That was the idea, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think occasions might arise when it would be unwise to say that the Secretary can lease for only a certain stated term of 20 years or a subsequent term of 10 years?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be unwise to have a limitation in there. The Secretary puts these leases up at competitive bidding and the oil bidder must have some assurance that he is going to have a definite period, and at least 20 years, before undertaking the large expenditures which he must undertake to develop his property. I think it would have a tendency to lower and depress the bids and that you would get better bids by having it for a period of 20 years.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that in writing a statute we should have solely in mind the benefits to the lessees?

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman does not think so, and he has had in mind both the lessor and the lessee, both the Government and the prospective bidder.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will yield further, might not occasions arise whereby the Secretary of the Interior in calling for bids would think it better to call for a lease of 15 years rather than for 20 years, and should he not have the opportunity to do so?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; 20 years is the ordinary life of the ordinary well.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps it might be of wells that have been discovered thus far.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If the well is not producing or if nothing can be done, the contract can be canceled by the Government and the claimant, and if it gets down to a small amount of 10 barrels they can reduce the royalty. It can be put from 1 to 20 years. In most of these instances a man will have expended enough money in getting his equipment, so that he can not afford to take the thing for five years, but if he gets a going well he ought to have that well until the oil is exhausted.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if the gentleman's argument is the basis upon which this section is drawn, then there ought not to be any limitation, because you will find if this plan is inaugurated that these people will get these wells in perpetuity, and there ought not to be any limitation. We ought simply to give them a lease for 999 years.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. There is a limitation of 20 years?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Then there is an extension of 10 and 10 years, and, as a matter of fact, he has the preferential right, and it is in substance a perpetual lease, with a right vested in the Secretary to fix the royalties at stated periods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in other words, it is intended that the man paying a proper royalty for 20 years is going to have a preferential right against everyone else. Then the Secretary, at these stated periods, may readjust the royalty, but the man should have the well until it is exhausted, and that is really the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman's statement applies to the language of the bill, and the same statement and claim can be advanced for the bill if it were amended as I propose, because there may be a well in some section where the Secretary might deem it wise, instead of leasing it for 20 years to lease it for 10 years, and he would call for bids upon that basis. There might be occasions where instead of renewing it for a successive term of 10 years he might deem it wise to extend it for 5 years. Of course, the preferential right would go to the lessee; but I think in writing a statute here, inaugurating a new policy, it would be wise to put in language which would vest discretion in the Secretary of the Interior to take care of the occasions that might arise. He still would have the right under the language as amended as I propose to lease for 20 years, but if some peculiar circumstance should arise he could reduce that term either in the renewal or the initial lease, and he will not affect the authority that is vested in him under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is altogether possible that in the running of the years some conditions might arise somewhere under which it might be in the public interest for the Secretary to have authority to lease for a briefer period than 10 years and 20 years, provided in the act; but as against that is the general question of public policy. The 20-year period provided for is the shortest of commercial-lease periods. The second 10 years is a period shorter than is ordinarily known in commercial leases.

There is some difference of opinion whether it would not be better in the public interest, speaking now from the standpoint of public interest rather than that of the interest of the lessee, to have these leases for an indeterminate period, as we have in the case of coal. In this case, section 17, we are adopting a plan which, I think, is questionable. Gentlemen who have been talking about monopolies, generally because of lack of knowledge of the provisions of the bill, curiously never refer to this particular provision, which is the one provision in the bill which it may be argued tends to monopoly—that is, that the bidding is to be competitive. In the case of competitive bidding, the longest pole gets the persimmon—the fellow with the longest purse pulls down the lease. We have discussed all that at one time and another in the House and in committee, and the majority has been of opinion that, everything considered, that is the wise thing to do. I have never agreed with that view. But the plan of competitive bids having been adopted, the public interest, I think, would hardly be served if we made the lease period so brief that we would not be likely to get the best results from bidding.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I can suggest one of the main considerations that fixed this period at 20 years, and that was this: If you fix it at a less period it will be a mere invitation upon the part of the operator to skim the cream off the production—to rush the production to the detriment of the well itself.

The ordinary length of period is the period that would be required to drain the well of every bit of oil that it has, and therefore it provides here that a man shall prosecute and drill to the extent of getting every bit of value there is. Now, ordinarily 20 years will do that; and if you fix a less period the Secretary of the Interior might be disposed to fix a less period. It will be merely an invitation to this man to get the cream of the stuff and turn back a ruined well to the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words so as to discuss this subject. I desire to get the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts. This lease is provided for under known productive territory within a geological survey that will produce oil or gas so far as their physical demonstration is concerned that no wells have been bored. Now, here is a 640-acre tract; no wells there. It is in a known geological structure where there are oil and gas. A man rents 640 acres. He may have to bore one, two, or five wells before he strikes oil. He may bore one that costs $20,000. Is he going to take his chance on a lease for five years at the same royalty that the other man may obtain his well within 500 feet of him, and at the end of five years yield up the question of the rental, all his casings, and all the material, and he has not yet been able to obtain enough oil to pay back the original costs at the end of the first four years, when his lease expires, and then the Secretary may extend him another lease for one year? But on this kind of a property the Secretary fixes the royalty. He fixes it for 20 years. Then at the end of that period he fixes it again, and in substance the man is entitled to a lease by complying with the rules and regulations and pay the royalty until the well is exhausted. Any other effort would be a waste of material, the oil and gas, would be a destruction of a man's property put into the well, and no good come from it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Will not the Secretary of the Interior or some of his subordinates have some knowledge of the character and capacity of this land which he is going to lease?

Mr. RAKER. No; it is a physical impossibility. The testimony before the committee is that the only way they determine the oil in the ground is by boring a well, and even if he is in this known geological structure, a quarter of a mile from a producing well, another well may be sunk and no oil obtained, and you may then go in another 300 feet from the dry well and obtain a gusher. While they know from all indications there from the general geological structure that there should be oil there, no man can tell, or has been able to tell, so far as the testimony shows before the committee, that any particular well sunk at any particular spot is going to produce oil.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 5, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum here. I think a bill as important as this ought to be heard by the Members of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members are present, a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That upon relinquishment to the United States, filed in the General Land Office within six months after the approval of this act, of all right, title, and interest claimed and possessed continuously since prior to July 3, 1910, by the claimant or his predecessor in interest under the preexisting placer mining law to any oil or gas bearing land upon which there has been drilled one or more oil or gas wells to discovery embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued September 27, 1909, and not within any naval petroleum reserve, and upon payment as royalty to the United States of an amount equal to the value at the time of production of one-eighth of all the oil or gas already produced, except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost, from such land, the claimant, or his successor, if in possession of such land, undisputed by any other claimant prior to July 1, 1919, shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years, at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent of all the oil or gas produced except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost: Provided, That not more than one-half of the area, but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres, within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field shall be leased to any one claimant under the provision of this section when the area of such geologic oil structure exceeds 640 acres. Any claimant or his successor, subject to this limitation, shall, however, have the right to select and receive the lease as in this section provided for that portion of his claim or claims equal to, but not in excess of, said one-half of the area of such geologic oil structure, but not more than 3,200 acres.

All such leases shall be made and the amount of royalty to be paid for oil and gas produced except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost, after the execution of such lease shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations: Provided, however, That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder or any part of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing said claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease: And provided further, That he may permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant or his successor within the limited area of 660 feet theretofore provided for upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

No fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section, but the successor in interest of such claimant without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired shall not be chargeable therewith.

Upon the delivery and acceptance of the lease, as in this section provided, all suits brought by the Government affecting such lands may be settled and adjusted in accordance herewith and all moneys impounded in such suits or under the act of August 25, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 708), shall be paid over to the parties entitled thereto. In case of conflicting claimants for leases under this section, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to grant leases to one or more of them as shall be deemed just. All leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant and all persons on or prior to September 1, 1919, claiming through or under him by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear; subject, however, to the same limitation as to area and acreage as is provided for claimant in this section: Provided, That no claimant acquiring any interest in such lands since September 1, 1919, shall secure a lease thereon under this section: Provided further, That not more than one lease shall be granted or inure to any applicant under this section.

That whenever the validity of any gas or petroleum placer claim under preexisting law to land embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued September 27, 1909, has been or may hereafter be drawn in question on behalf of the United States in any departmental or judicial proceedings, the President is hereby authorized at any time within 12 months after the approval of this act to direct the compromise and settlement of any such controversy upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, to be carried out by an exchange or division of land or division of the proceeds of operation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAILE: Page 56, line 19, after the word "further," strike out the balance of said line and all of lines 20 and 21 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "That no lease or leases under this section shall be granted or inure to any person, association, or corporation for a greater aggregate area or acreage than the maximum in this section provided for."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the purpose of this provision for which I have offered a substitute was merely to limit the total acreage which should be acquired by one surrendering his possessory title to the maximum provided in this section. The lines which I ask to strike out are "Provided further, That not more than one lease shall be granted or inure to any applicant under this section." I can not see the advantage of providing that the lessee should have his title evidenced by only one document. This would seem to be as unnecessary and as awkward as to require that the documents by which all of any man's real estate titles are evidenced should be combined in a single instrument.

It must be remembered that in the Wyoming field people began locating these claims back in the eighties under the placer mining laws, and the titles are in every degree of complexity. Some of them are still contested by different claimants. I appreciate that this section confers power upon the Secretary in case of conflicts to grant leases to one or more of the claimants as shall be deemed just, but he may not be able to make his decision in regard to claim A, the title to which is doubtful, as soon as he can to claim B, the title to which is clear. But must the present owner, whose right to B is determinable at once, wait months and perhaps years for his lease to B because it takes that long to determine his right to A? Or must he take his lease to B and forego his right to a lease of A? Or must the lease which he has been given for B be later enlarged to include A?

It seems to me that the provision as now drawn will involve both the Government and the locators in a maze of cumbersome and contradictory detail. One result which would be pretty sure to follow is that the locator will endeavor to continue to hold by his possessory title the claims upon which his rights can not be speedily adjudicated, while taking a lease for the remainder. This would force a situation which it is the very purpose of this bill to avoid, namely, titles held in part as placer locations under the preexisting laws and in part as leaseholds. And there is nothing whatever to be gained by this confusion. If you limit the leaseholds to a specified total area, you accomplish your object, whether they are held under one lease or under a dozen leases.

The physical conditions of oil territory would make a further confusion. The unit of the placer entries under which the possessory titles have already been acquired was 40 acres. We provide in this bill that an applicant surrendering his possessory titles may in lieu thereof take by lease a maximum of half the whole geological structure, when it is over 640 acres, but not to exceed 3,200 acres in all. Now, then, these 40-acre claims lie often in different geological structures within the same general vicinity. For instance, you may have one of the claims within territory where drilling goes to the first sand, and oil is developed within a depth of from 900 to 1,000 feet. A very short distance farther, there may be a claim of the same owners, where they have to drill through the first sand and come to the second sand. Obviously the royalties which must be paid are different, and the conditions of the lease that the Government will have to exact must be different, and since the purpose of limiting the total holdings is accomplished by having the general limitation, there could be no useful purpose in requiring these to be evidenced by a single lease.

Furthermore, as already indicated, the history of possessory titles is that each one is different. It would often result in a lease being tied up for quite a period while rights in litigation were waiting to be adjusted or while the Secretary could determine which of several kinds of partitions of interests should apply. Your lease would be a patchwork of differing provisions. It might be of 100 pages for a lease of 1,000 or 1,500 acres.

I do not try to enlarge the lessee's right under this amendment, but only to clarify it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not sure that I entirely understand this, but if I correctly understand the gentleman, the Secretary of the Interior might be willing to grant the lease for a certain portion, but the other part might be held up if this provision is in force?

Mr. VAILE. Might be held up until the rights of previous locators were determined. In a great many cases there are conflicts between these possessory titles as to who is entitled to them.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment. I think it really clarifies the intent of the section. The language that he seeks to strike out was a committee amendment to the Senate bill. The Senate had a limitation of 3,200 acres to any individual. Then they had the inuring clause, commencing in line 11, page 56, "that all leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant and all persons," and so on, claiming under him. Now, the committee felt that this inuring clause made vain and nugatory the limitation of 3,200 acres in the first part of the bill. So we endeavored to have language in here limiting the acreage that would inure to any individual and limiting it to the same area and acreage as is provided for in the first part of the section; and in endeavoring to do that I think we put in an amendment that may result in more or less administrative embarrassment and difficulty. With the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] we attain the object that we were endeavoring to attain by the language the House committee inserted, and also relieve the department from any embarrassment it might have should it desire to issue to any applicant more than one lease, not, however, for more than 3,200 acres in the aggregate. For that reason I approve of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRIFFIN: Page 55, line 25, after the word "section," strike out all of that line, and, on page 56, line 1, strike out all of that line, and, on the same page, line 2, strike out all of that line.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the paragraph that it is proposed to amend only consists of a few words. It reads:

No fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section, but the successor in interest of such claimant without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired shall not be chargeable therewith.

Now, it is an ancient maxim of the law that a thief can give no better title than he has. That is embedded in our law. If there are equities in a case, that is what our courts of equity are provided for, namely, to do justice. But note what you are doing. You are giving sanctity to a tainted title. You are putting the burden upon the Government to show that the man did not have notice that the title was tainted. Does the committee really want to do that?

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Has the committee given thought to that proposition? I have no more to say with regard to the amendment. It appears to be obvious that it changes the House bill, making it conform to the Senate bill, and simply provides that the claim of a fraudulent claimant shall not be recognized and can not be assigned, no matter whether the assignee has knowledge of the fraud or not. If he has no knowledge of the fraud, the burden should be put on him to show his innocence.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is not the language of this provision now that the gentleman is seeking to strike out simply the well-known rule applicable to real estate transfers?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I do not think so. I think it is an anticipation of that rule. In a real estate deal a man has got to go to a court of equity in order to clear the title, and the court removes the cloud on the title. Here you permit a cloud to rest upon it and put the burden upon the Government, instead of on the claimant, to establish the fact as to claimant's knowledge of the fraud.

Mr. BARBOUR. This is simply on the ground of fraud. There are certain other clouds that have to be removed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the door you open to fraud.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. I would like to hear from the committee on this subject.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, this language that we are writing into the law is what Judge Bean and a number of other judges have decided to be the law, that the innocent purchaser's right is not impaired by the fraud of his predecessor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that certain cases of location on the public domain are held by certain courts to be fraud which do not contain elements of fraud and are no intentional violation of the law?

Mr. SINNOTT. That was the decision in the case of California against the Midway Oil Co., in last June, by Judge Bean.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. For a question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is just the point. You do not need to state it in the act. It is in the law. It is in the decisions.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is not that the rule of law that is laid down in a case where real property is involved?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and call this to the attention of the gentleman. The provision here is much more restrictive than if there was no reference to fraud. It states here that anyone coming before the department for a lease shall receive no recognition if he is guilty of fraud in any way. No man with unclean hands can come in and get anything; the law exempts a man who had no means of knowing that the claim which he acquired was tainted with irregularities. Suppose the gentleman bought a mining claim; he would have a search of title; the title so far as the abstract was concerned might be perfect, with nothing on the face of the record to show that it is tainted with fraud. If he is not chargeable in any way with the knowledge of any preceding fraud, he is outside of any charge of evasion of the section.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Do you consider a man who takes title without knowledge of a fraud as being culpable or chargeable with fraud?

Mr. ELSTON. I certainly believe he is not.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly not. Is not the language of this section sufficient now when you say that "no fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section," and stop there?

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman suggest to strike that out?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No. Leave that in: "No fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section."

Mr. ELSTON. That might do if the Secretary of the Interior did not try to carry it further and charge the claimant with knowledge of matters which he had no reasonable means of ascertaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. Do you desire to charge him with any kind of constructive knowledge and impute fraud to him which he should not be chargeable with? This exception is carried into the decisions, and certainly it is proper.

Mr. GRIFFIN. You are trying to crystallize a judicial decision into a statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAILE: Page 56, line 22, at the beginning of the line, insert the word and figures "SEC. 18 a," so as to make the paragraph a new section.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide a better logical arrangement of this act. We are embarking upon an entirely new policy with reference to our public-land laws. This paragraph, in my judgment, is a most wise provision providing a reviewing authority to compromise and settle controversies relative to titles to placer lands acquired heretofore. As stated by the chairman of the committee in his report on this bill, the purpose of this paragraph, among other things, is to furnish an alternative method of compromising and settling litigation and controversies arising from withdrawal orders in which the Government is involved with claimants. It being designed for such purpose and to enable the Government to equitably adjust any matter that may be necessary to adjust in passing from the old patent system to the new leasing system, it seems to me the paragraph should be numbered as a separate section of the bill. Therefore, I offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That any person who, prior to any withdrawal order made subsequent to July 3, 1910, or who on October 1, 1919, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry, and who had previously performed all acts under then existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery, and upon which discovery had not been made prior to the passage of this act, and who has performed work or expended on or for the benefit of such locations an amount equal in the aggregate of $250 for each location if application therefor shall be made within six months from the passage of this act shall be entitled to prospecting permits thereon upon the same terms and conditions, and limitations as to acreage, as other permits provided for in this act, or where any such person has heretofore made such discovery, he shall be entitled to a lease thereon under such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe unless otherwise provided for in section 18 hereof: Provided, That where such prospecting permit is granted upon land within any known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field, the royalty to be fixed in any lease thereafter granted thereon or any portion thereof shall be not less than 12½ per cent of all the oil or gas produced except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost: Provided, however, That such lands are not reserved for the use of the Navy: Provided, however, That no claimant for a permit or lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

All permits or leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant, and all persons on or prior to September 1, 1919, claiming through or under him, by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear: Provided, That no claimant acquiring any interest in such lands since September 1, 1919, shall secure a permit or lease thereon under this section.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Section 19, page 57, strike out all after the word and figures "Section 19," on line 8, all of line 9, all of line 10, and all of line 11 down to and including the word "entry," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That any person who on October 1, 1919, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands under a claim initiated while such lands were not withdrawn from oil or gas location and entry."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, there has always been a great deal of confusion and ambiguity about the meaning of the first three lines in section 19. The committee has put in the language in several different ways, and finally adopted the language in the bill, but still the language is confusing. It refers to "any person who prior to any withdrawal order was an occupant of lands not withdrawn." It is really a confusion or a contradiction of terms. I think this language which I offer will clear it up, with the addition of an amendment which I expect to offer on the next page, in line 7, making it absolutely certain that this section does not in any way relate or refer to the naval reserves.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which ought to supplement this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 58, line 7, strike out the word "such," also the words "are not," and insert after the word "that" the following: "The provisions of this section shall not apply to," so that the line will read as follows: "That the provisions of this section shall not apply to lands reserved for the use of the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee, if I may. The matter was called to my attention that we had in section 18 a particular fraud clause that was originally used in the House bill as it passed last year, and that in this section and the Alaska section we had adopted the particular clause inserted by the Senate of a different character. We have just passed and agreed to the particular clause originally employed in the House bill, and I was wondering if the chairman would be willing to offer amendments making it uniform. The Alaskan people thought we ought not to provide one particular clause for them and another for other sections of the country.

Mr. SINNOTT. It ought to be made uniform for conference purposes.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope that can be worked out in conference so that they will be the same. The amendment would be on page 58. Strike out the provision in lines 8 to 12 and insert the language of the House bill as it appears on page 55 and insert the same language as is found on page 55, line 24. This merely makes it uniform. The old language was drafted and approved by the Interior Department. It was carefully prepared.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman offers that amendment I will have no objection to it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that on page 58 we strike out the following language from line 8 to line 12 and insert in lieu thereof the provision already agreed to on page 55, beginning on line 24, and on page 56, lines 1 and 2, in the interest of harmonizing these provisions. The chairman has just said he had no objection to it. The Alaska people feel the same clause should apply to all. I confess it seems to me they are right about it. If there is any advantage about it one way or the other it will be easy to care for it in conference.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Clerk report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERRIS: Page 58, beginning with line 8, strike out all of lines 8 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "No fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section, but the successor in interest of such claimant without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired shall not be chargeable therewith."

Mr. FERRIS. Now, if we may insert the words "Provided, however, That," that will be the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the words "Provided, however, That," in line 8, page 58, be retained.

Mr. FERRIS. That will make it right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment suggested?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested to me by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, Judge WATKINS, and also by the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. GRIGSBY], and also by some other gentlemen who are here in the interest of Alaskan matters, that to have a fraud clause of one kind for the oil operators of the United States and another fraud clause applicable to Alaska did not seem quite right to them, and we have adopted the clause relating to fraud in section 18, which I desire to offer now. I think this modification ought to be made. It makes it uniform. It treats all classes of oil claimants alike. Personally I do not see any material difference. The amendment I offer is the language just agreed to in section 18. It is also identical with the House bill of last year which had the approval of this House, and also had the approval of all the departments. Personally I have no preference, but it ought to be uniform.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman wants a fraud clause in here at all, why does he take the weakest fraud clause there is in the bill to make the language uniform?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not concede that it is the weakest, although there is some controversy about that. The fraud clause that we had last year was very carefully drawn by the Interior Department and very carefully worked out by the committee. The House passed it. It is exactly the clause that we have had in former years. I do not think there is any advantage about it, and I do not think it is of any very great consequence; but the Alaskan people feel that if we are going to provide one fraud clause for the big oil operators in the United States, there should not be a different kind of a fraud clause applied to them, where they have little or no development in oil. Further than that I have no interest in it. It ought to be carried through the bill. It ought to be uniform.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the concluding statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma puts the argument right in a nutshell. If you are not going to have a drastic fraud clause applicable to the big interests in the United States, why should you have a drastic fraud clause applicable to the poor folks in Alaska?

Now, just reverse that argument, if you please. We have turned about and given a weak fraud clause for the benefit of the big interests in the United States. The question before us is whether or not we shall now remove the drastic provision applicable to the Alaskans and give them the benefit of the weaker provision which you have given to the interests in the United States. When I offered my amendment, objecting to the weak, wishy-washy fraud clause that you stuck in this bill for the benefit of the big interests in the United States, I had it in mind that there were stronger fraud clauses in the bill which ought to stay in the bill. The Alaska clause is one of them.

The objection that the gentleman has to the language of the Alaska provision that the gentleman seeks to strike out is that it is drastic. Well, it ought to be drastic. If he is so much concerned about uniformity, why not apply uniformly the clause that has teeth in it? This provision provides that no claimant for a permit or lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who has knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section. That is perfectly fair and perfectly reasonable to all, Alaskan and American. We ought to vote against the amendment. If the gentleman wants uniformity, let us apply the drastic provision generally which is found on page 56.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 35, noes 8.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. BLANTON was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. He is not entitled to tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not entitled to tellers for the purpose of determining a quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not making it on the question of a quorum. I am making it on the last vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand comes too late. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

MINING OF COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. In the case of lands bona fide entered as agricultural, and not withdrawn or classified as mineral at the time of entry, but not including lands claimed under any railroad grant, the entryman or patentee, or assigns, where assignment was made prior to January 1, 1918, if the entry has been patented with the mineral right reserved, shall be entitled to a preference right to a permit and to a lease, as herein provided, in case of discovery; and within an area not greater than a township such entryman and patentees, or assigns, holding restricted patents may combine their holdings not to exceed 2,560 acres for the purpose of making joint application. Leases executed under this section and embracing only lands so entered shall provide for the payment of a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent as to such areas within the permit as may not be included within the discovery lease to which the permittee is entitled under section 14 hereof.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On Saturday the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] ventured the thought that I had not read this bill. Now, it may be that I had not, and, if I had not, I am not going to take any blame upon myself for not having read it, not being a member of the committee and having this complicated bill put into our hands at a moment's notice.

The House committee bill looks like a substitute to the Senate bill, but, in fact, it is only an amendment which consists in taking the Senate bill and drawing a line through every section and then copying it section by section, practically in the same words, making no material changes until they came down to sections 40 and 41 of the Senate bill. And there we find the nigger in the woodpile. Those are the two sections which obviously the committee were anxious to get at.

I have taken the trouble to go through the Senate bill and compare it with the House committee substitute and show in the following table all the changes that have been made:

S. 2775.

The original Senate bill, 41 sections, 38 pages.
House committee bill, 38 sections, 75 pages.

COAL.

Section 1, same, except (a) exclusion of lands acquired under Appalachian Forest act; (b) provision as to helium; and (c) redrafting of alien provision. Adds 11 lines.

Section 2, same, except (a) providing for competitive bidding (20 lines); (b) providing for one lease to a railroad less than 200 miles in length (3 lines). Adds 23 lines.

Section 3, same.
Section 4, same.
Section 5, same.
Section 6, same.

Section 7, same, except (a) adds 5 words on line 21, page 42; (b) provides for suspension of operation (4 lines). Adds 5 lines.

Section 8, same, except (a) verbal change; (b) omits prohibition as to extension of privilege to corporation. Reduces 1 line.

Section 9, same; changes word "person" to "applicant."

Section 10, same, except (a) omission of Senate provision as to shape of land leased. Reduces 1 line.

Section 11, same, except (a) inserts "shall" instead of "may."

Section 12, same.

OIL AND GAS.

Section 13, same except (a) adds provision limiting Alaska prospecting permits to five. Adds 1 line.

Section 14, same, except (a) adds provision as to leases of 160 acres (3 lines); (b) transposes provision as to right of renewal; (c) omits six months' limitation (one-half line); (d) adds one-half line; (e) adds provision as to competitive bidding. Adds 4 lines.

Section 15, same.
Section 16, same.
Section 17, same.

Section 18, same, except (a) seven verbal changes; only one substantial change, and that adds the following: (b) "but the successor in interest of such claimant [fraudulent], without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired, shall not be chargeable therewith"; adds three lines; this is contrary to the spirit of our law. (c) Page 56, line 13, adds limitation as to time. (d) Adds provision for compromise of conflicting claims embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal of September 27, 1909. Adds 18 lines.

Section 19, same, except three verbal changes. (b) Adds new limitation as to time. Seven lines.

Section 20, same, except (a) adds word "assigns" in two places; (b) increases royalty to 12½ per cent.

OIL SHALE.

Section 21. Senate bill, 44 lines; House committee bill, 42 lines. Reduces two lines.

ALASKA OIL PROVISO.

Section 22. Senate bill, 30 lines; House committee bill, 30 lines.

SODIUM.

Section 23. Senate bill, 13 lines; House committee bill, 13 lines.

Section 24. Senate bill, 37 lines; House committee bill, 37 lines.

Section 25. Senate bill, 11 lines; House committee bill, 11 lines.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Section 26. Senate bill, 8 lines; House committee bill, 7 lines.

Section 27. Senate bill, 57 lines; House committee bill, 58 lines.

Section 28. Senate bill, 30 lines; House committee bill, 29 lines.

Section 29. Senate bill, 22 lines; House committee bill, 22 lines.

Section 30. Senate bill, 32 lines; House committee bill, 32 lines.

Section 31. Senate bill, 10 lines; House committee bill, 10 lines.

Section 32. Senate bill, 9 lines; House committee bill, 9 lines.

Section 33. Senate bill, 5 lines; House committee bill, 5 lines.

Section 34. Senate bill, 8 lines; House committee bill, 8 lines.

Section 35. Senate bill, 20 lines; House committee bill, 21 lines.

Section 36. Senate bill, 32 lines; House committee bill, 28 lines.

Section 37. Senate bill, 8 lines; House committee bill, 10 lines.

Section 38. Senate bill, 4 lines; House committee bill, 7 lines. (Omitted in House bill. New section 38 relates to helium.)

Section 39. Senate bill, 11 lines. (Omitted in House committee bill.)

Section 40. Senate bill, 18 lines. (Omitted in House committee bill.)

Section 41. Senate bill, 32 lines. (Omitted in House committee bill.)

RECAPITULATION.

In the entire House committee bill there are only 60 lines added, which, if added to the Senate bill in the form of amendments, would have increased its length about 3 pages, making it 41 instead of 38 pages. The House committee bill takes up 75 pages—a tremendous waste of printing and paper at a time when we hear so much about economy. Why, then, this laborious blotting out of the Senate bill only to repeat its provisions down to and excepting sections 40 and 41? If the committee wanted to strike those sections out, all they need have done was to draw lines through them, indicating that they desired to exclude them.

But, no, that would never do. If they amended the Senate bill section by section and struck out sections 40 and 41, that would have entitled the House to move to amend by restoring them. By reason of the aid given by the Rules Committee in bringing in the rule requiring the House to consider the House committee bill as an original bill we are now burdened with the task of reading the committee bill section by section, instead of reading the Senate bill section by section. If we want to read the Senate bill for comparison we have to overcome the difficulty of reading it through blotted lines. But that is not the worst. I am no prophet, but I venture the prediction that when an effort is made, as it will be made, to restore sections 40 and 41 to the bill, we will find the committee making the point of order that the amendments are not germane. The question naturally arises whether this was not their real purpose in camouflaging the Senate bill. Would it not have been much fairer to the House to let the House committee amendments stand or fall on their merits? I made the statement on Saturday that the title of this bill might well be changed to read "A bill to surrender to the Coal Trust and to the Oil Trust of this country all the valuable rights which are now lying dormant in the West."

Please understand me, gentlemen, in my position here to-day that I am resolutely in favor of the development of your great and glorious West. I want to see you develop it. I want to encourage the taking out of coal from the veins in the earth, and the finding of oil wells, but I want also to protect you and the consumers of the great United States as well, and to see that safeguards shall be thrown around the granting of these valuable rights. I do not want to see the wealth of this country, temporarily withdrawn from public use by President Taft for the protection of posterity, handed over now to the Standard Oil Co. and other big interests to enhance their present plethoric surpluses and enable them to further exploit the public.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, section 20 in its present form is a new provision; that is, it is, rather, an extension of an old provision. I think the purpose of the section most excellent. I would like to ask the chairman his opinion in regard to the effect of the section. As I understand, the intent is to authorize the entrymen or patentees to combine in an application, or to make a combined application, as though they were one person, and that when the application is thus made a permit would issue as in the ordinary case. In case of a discovery, the lease would be made as provided for in section 14. In other words, this combined application, if made in combined form, would be treated under section 14 exactly as though it was an individual application. Is that true?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think they would organize themselves either into an association or corporation and apply in that way. I think that is the intent of the section.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and in doing so I want to say that there is no material change whatever in this section—only two verbal changes.

The Clerk read as follows:

OIL SHALE.

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease to any person or corporation qualified under this act any deposits of oil shale belonging to the United States and the surface of so much of the public lands containing such deposits, or land adjacent thereto, as may be required for the extraction and reduction of the leased minerals, under such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as he may prescribe; that no lease hereunder shall exceed 5,120 acres of land, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, or if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the United States, at the expense of the applicant, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Leases may be for indeterminate periods, upon such conditions as may be imposed by the Secretary of the Interior, including covenants relative to methods of mining, prevention of waste, and productive development. For the privilege of mining, extracting, and disposing of the oil or other minerals covered by a lease under this section the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as shall be specified in the lease and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, at the rate of 50 cents per acre per annum for the lands included in the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties accruing for that year; such royalties to be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products from shales the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any royalty and rental during the first five years of any lease: Provided, That any person having a valid claim to such minerals under existing laws on January 1, 1919, shall upon the relinquishment of such claim be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this section for such area of the land relinquished as shall not exceed the maximum area authorized by this section to be leased to an individual or corporation: Provided, however, That no claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section: Provided further, That not more than one lease shall be granted under this section to any one person, association, or corporation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Oklahoma to the fact that in this section is another one of those provisions with teeth in it, and it ought to be in order at this time to strike it out.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, without assenting to the implication of the gentleman from Minnesota, in the interest of uniformity I do move to strike out the language in lines 7 to 10, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the language that has been inserted in the two previous sections found on the bottom of page 55.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 23, after the word "corporation," strike out the words "Provided, however, That no claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That no fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section, but the successor in interest of such claimant without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired shall not be chargeable therewith."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were 32 ayes and 5 noes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes had it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is dividing and the gentleman can not make the point of order now.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SINNOTT and Mr. CARTER.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Minnesota that there was no quorum. While the Chair was counting I moved that the committee do now rise, That was pending while the Chair was counting a quorum. I moved that the committee rise, and the committee decided not to rise. Now, would another motion for the committee to rise, there having been in the meantime no business transacted, be in order before the Chair determines that a quorum was present?

The CHAIRMAN. Here is the parliamentary situation. The gentleman from Minnesota raised the question of no quorum. The gentleman from Texas made a motion that the committee rise. The committee declined to rise. The Chair then counted and disclosed the fact that there was no quorum; and then tellers were demanded, and the committee decided that it should have tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. And tellers are asked for on the question of the committee rising.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were 3 yeas and 85 noes.

So the motion that the committee rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, when the motion to rise was made there was pending a point of no quorum, and the vote just taken discloses that there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2775, and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, when 225 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the list of absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that when the point of no quorum was raised the committee was dividing on the question of an amendment, and that the vote should now be taken on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreeed to.

ALASKA OIL PROVISO.

SEC. 22. That any bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands in the Territory of Alaska, who, or whose predecessors in interest, prior to withdrawal had complied otherwise with the requirements of the mining laws, but had made no discovery of oil or gas in wells and who had made substantial improvements for the discovery of oil or gas on or for each location or had prior to the passage of this act expended not less than $250 in improvements on or for each location shall be entitled, upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States within one year from the date of this act, or within six months after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, to a prospecting permit or permits, lease or leases, under this act covering such lands, not exceeding five permits or leases in number and not exceeding an aggregate of 1,280 acres in each: Provided, That leases in Alaska under this act, whether as a result of prospecting permits or otherwise, shall be upon such rental and royalties as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and specified in the lease, and be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period of the lease, and may, in the discretion of the Secretary, include noncontiguous tracts: Provided further, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products in Alaska the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any rental or royalty not exceeding the first five years of any lease.

No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 62, by striking out the language in the lines 7 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the language on page 55, which has been inserted heretofore in the other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERRIS: On page 62, beginning with line 7, strike out all of lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, however, That no fraudulent claimant shall be entitled to any lease provided for in this section, but the successor in interest of such claimant without notice of fraud at the time such interest was acquired shall not be chargeable therewith."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma is one which, in common with other amendments which he has offered—and, I am sure, without any intent of that kind—has the effect of weakening the fraud provisions of the bill. The provision as it stands in the bill puts everyone on notice as to whether fraud has been committed or not. It requires every purchaser of lands embraced within the purview of this act to make a reasonable inquiry as to the title which his predecessor in interest had. If the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma be adopted, any purchaser may shut his eyes and, without making any effort at all to determine whether his predecessor's title was fraudulent or not, take the land absolutely without any taint of fraud. I am willing to grant that a man who takes land innocently after making due inquiry and after making every effort reasonable to ascertain that his predecessor's title was good ought to be protected, but I think you go a long way toward encouraging fraud in these matters when you undertake to invite people who come in as secondary owners of these lands to shut their eyes to the character of the title which their predecessor in interest had. I think you go a long way toward encouraging fraud when you say to a man, "All that is necessary for you to do in order to be absolutely secure in your title, as against any fraud which your predecessor in interest committed, is to shut your eyes and make no inquiry whatever as to the character of the title or the way in which he secured his interest."

I want to serve notice now that, while I would like to vote for this bill, if the Committee on Public Lands continues to put in provisions weakening the law, making its provisions against fraud absolutely nugatory, I shall find it very difficult, if not impossible, to vote for it; and I do not want the Committee on Public Lands to put me in that position, because I should like to vote for legislation which will permit the development of these lands under circumstances which will amply protect the public interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—ayes 57, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That upon showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of any of the substances enumerated in section 23 hereof has been discovered by the permittee within the area covered by his permit and that such land is chiefly valuable therefor the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-half of the land embraced in the prospecting permit, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of the amount or value of the production, to be taken and described by legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, or if the land be not surveyed by survey executed at the cost of the permittee in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. The permittee shall also have the preference right to lease the remainder of the lands embraced within the limits of his permit at a royalty to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior. Lands known to contain such valuable deposits as are enumerated in section 23 hereof and not covered by permits or leases, except such lands as are situated in said county of San Bernardino, shall be held subject to lease, and may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, and in such areas as he shall fix, not exceeding 2,560 acres; all leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, and the payment in advance of a rental of 50 cents per acre for the first calendar year or fraction thereof and $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited on the royalty for that year. Leases may be for indeterminate periods, subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period, upon such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be incorporated in each lease or prescribed in general regulation theretofore issued by the Secretary of the Interior, including covenants relative to mining methods, waste, period of preliminary development, and minimum production, and a lessee under this section may be lessee of the remaining lands in his permit.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question in reference to this section. The first part of this section authorizes the permittee to operate his holding at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of the amount or value of the production. This part provides "that the permittee shall have a preferential right to lease the remainder of the land embraced within the limits of the permits at a royalty to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior." Now, what I want to ask the chairman of the committee is, whether the last provision I have read is intended to permit the Secretary of the Interior to lease the remainder of the land to the permittee at a royalty less than that provided for the other half of the leasehold.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; the Secretary would not do that. He would probably go higher. He gets the prospecting permit and upon the discovery of sodium he is entitled to one-half of the land at a royalty of not less than one-eighth.

Mr. ANDERSON. If it were proper to put in a limitation of less than one-eighth in the first place it seems to me it would be clearly proper to put any such limitation with respect to the last half.

Mr. SINNOTT. There would not be any objection to that. Of course, the Secretary would not lease for any less royalty.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume, and I think it would be a reasonable assumption, that the failure of Congress to put into this provision the limitation which is put into the other might indicate an intention on the part of Congress that the last half should be leased for less than the minimum royalty.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Secretary would read into it some limitation. He would probably exact a higher royalty for the balance, as is done in the oil wells.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want also to direct the attention of the gentleman to line 24, page 63, in which there appears to be no limit at all upon the royalty, because the provision provides that the lease shall be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease. Is there any differentiation there which resulted in the committee refraining from making a minimum in that case?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; there was not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Page 63, line 14, after the word "royalty," insert "of not less than one-eighth of the amount or value of the production."

Mr. SINNOTT. I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. RAKER. A point of order—the Clerk has not reported the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 63, line 14, after the word "royalty," insert "of not less than one-eighth of the amount or value of the production."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the same amendment after the word "royalty," in line 24, page 63.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 63, line 24, after the word "royalty," insert "of not less than one-eighth of the amount or value of the production."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That in addition to areas of such mineral land which may be included in any such prospecting permits or leases, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to a permittee or lessee of lands containing sodium deposits, and subject to the payment of an annual rental of not less than 25 cents per acre, the exclusive right to use, during the life of the permit or lease, a tract of unoccupied nonmineral public land, not exceeding 40 acres in area, for camp sites, refining works, and other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the permit or lease.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have to preface my question with respect to this section with the statement that I admit I do not know very much about this sodium proposition, but the preceding section and section 23 authorize the total holding to one permittee of 2,560 acres. It would seem that the holding ought to be sufficient to cover the land necessary for camp sites, refining works, and other purposes of that sort, without the additional amount carried in section 25. I rose for the purpose of asking the committee what is the reason for this provision?

Mr. SINNOTT. A man may have a plant away and apart from the original leasehold. Now, in my State they are taking sodium salts and they are transporting them in a pipe line, or expect to transport them, 50 or 60 miles to the main plant, that may be on public land several miles from the leasehold, and that is to meet a case of that kind.

Mr. ANDERSON. Do I understand the gentleman that it is not necessary in working these sodium deposits that the plant should be contiguous to the deposit?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is not so in my State.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall take or hold more than one coal, phosphate, or sodium lease during the life of such lease in any one State; no person, association, or corporation shall take or hold at one time more than three oil or gas leases granted hereunder in any one State and not more than one lease within the geologic structure of the same producing oil or gas field; no corporation shall hold any interest as a stockholder of another corporation in more than such number of leases; and no person or corporation shall take or hold any interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof, which, together with the area embraced in any direct holding of a lease under this act, or which, together with any other interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof, for any kind of mineral leased hereunder, exceeds in the aggregate an amount equivalent to the maximum number of acres of the respective kinds of minerals allowed to any one lessee under this act. Any interests held in violation of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located, except that any ownership or interest forbidden in this act which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit sections 18, 19, and 22 or to prevent any number of lessees under the provisions of this act from combining their several interests so far as may be necessary for the purposes of constructing and carrying on the business of a refinery, or of establishing and constructing as a common carrier a pipe line or lines of railroads to be operated and used by them jointly in the transportation of oil from their several wells, or from the wells of other lessees under this act, or the transportation of coal: Provided further, That any combination for such purpose or purposes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior on application to him for permission to form the same: And provided further, That if any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, or sodium entered into by the lessee, or any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise to which such lessee shall be a party, of which his or its output is to be or become the subject, to control the price or prices thereof or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of the amounts of lands provided in this act, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of lines 7 and 8, page 67, the words "with consent of lessee."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 67, line 7, after the word "trust," strike out the words "with consent of lessee."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The purpose of this provision found on page 67 evidently is to prevent combinations, and yet with those words in it loses all force for that purpose. For instance, it has been stated here, and I presume it is a fact, that there are 27 corporations under the control of the Standard Oil Co., or known as Standard Oil corporations. Each of those corporations is entitled to buy and sell and own stock in other corporations. A corporation itself can only sin by the acts of the corporation or its officers acting within the purview of their duty. Therefore if one of these 27 corporations forms another corporation for the purpose of leasing, and it holds 51 per cent of the stock, the balance being held by other persons, it can control all of that territory, and the 27 corporations can control 27 leasing propositions, which will not be subject to the provisions of this act. If you strike out "with consent of the lessee," you then give virility to this provision. If you leave it in, it is absolutely useless.

Mr. SINNOTT. If you strike that out, a man's property and lease would be forfeited if some one does something without his consent.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Not unless it is in the combination.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAILE: Page 6, line 15, after the figures "18," insert the figures "18 (a)."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, this is merely to cover the previous section, which we divided, so as to include them both.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The provision beginning on line 6, page 6, provides:

Any interests held in violation of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General.

And so forth.

I take it that under that language the holding is valid, and any operations conducted under it would be valid until after action brought by the United States. Am I correct in my construction of that language?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would relate to a lease, but not to a permit. The Secretary has certain rights under a permit, but after the permit is merged into a lease, then it will take court action.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask what was the reason for that sort of a provision? Ordinarily a lease would be void ab initio, but here you put the entire burden on the Government to proceed to forfeit the lease before anything can be done in the way of showing fraud.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is in recognition of that legal, or equitable, principle that the law abhors a forfeiture, and there must be a showing made in court before the forfeiture can be secured.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume a man could scarcely hold a larger amount of land under this act than the act permits, without knowing it. Therefore it seems to me that it ought to provide that the holding of an amount in excess of the amount permitted by the law should be void from the beginning.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, a man might inadvertently secure more stock than he is entitled to; and it is in line with all court proceedings in relation to forfeiture.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in line 7, page 66, after the word "be" the words "void and shall be." So that it will read:

Any interests held in violation of this act shall be void and shall be forfeited to the United States.

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 66, line 7, after the word "be" insert "void and shall be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 33.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the Committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is withdrawn.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, calling his attention to lines 13 and 14, on page 66. What is the purpose of the language "to be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition"?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is in case the property devolves upon some one by descent, will, judgment, or decree. They do not want to compel him to summarily dispose of it at once, but they give him a little grace.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. That is where he has too many acres? Is that it?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no. If this property devolves upon him an excess amount, too many acres——

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. That is what I meant.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a separate section, 27a.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAER: Page 67, line 18, after the word "proceedings," insert a new section, 27a:

"SEC. 27a. That, subject to the provisions, limitations, and conditions of this act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue leases for coal, oil, oil shale, or gas deposits owned by the United States and the lands containing same to any State of the United States the constitution and laws of which authorize it to engage in the business of mining or extracting, treating, and disposing of such mineral deposits."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that. It is not germane to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BAER. I want to make one remark. I made that amendment to the bill under the coal provision, and did not include oil and phosphates. While it may not be germane to the section, I will introduce it at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That rights of way through the public lands, including the forest reserves, of the United States are hereby granted for pipe-line purposes for the transportation of oil or natural gas to any applicant possessing the qualifications provided in section 1 of this act to the extent of the ground occupied by the said pipe line and 25 feet on each side of the same under such regulations as to survey, location, application, and use as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and upon the express condition that such pipe lines shall be constructed, operated, and maintained as common carriers: Provided, That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, assignee, or beneficiary, if owner, or operator or owner of a controlling interest in any pipe line or of any company operating the same which may be operated accessible to the oil derived from lands under such lease, shall at reasonable rates and without discrimination accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company, not the owner of any pipe line, operating a lease or purchasing gas or oil under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no right of way shall hereafter be granted over said lands for the transportation of oil or natural gas except under and subject to the provisions, limitations, and conditions of this section. Failure to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior shall be ground for forfeiture of the grant by the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located in an appropriate proceeding.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, on line 23, page 67, I ask that the word "aet" be stricken out and the word "act" be substituted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Strike out, in line 23, page 67, the word "aet" and insert the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, apparently this section proposes to grant rights of way to every applicant under this act, and provides that the Government may in express terms reserve and provide that the owner "shall at reasonable rates and without discrimination accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company, not the owner of any pipe line, operating a lease or purchasing gas or oil under the provisions of this act." I can not find in this section any place where any person is required to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for the right of way. His right of way is granted by the bill itself. I do not see any way by which he can get before the Secretary of the Interior so that the Secretary can impose any limitations on him.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is down at the bottom of page 67, "under such regulations as to survey, location, application, and use as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. ANDERSON. That is to say, that under general language it is contemplated that the Secretary will require an application in every case where the lessee under the provisions of this act desires to use any public lands. Is that correct?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think that is a reasonable construction of it.

Mr. ANDERSON. There was some doubt in my mind as to whether the general language to which the gentleman refers was sufficient to make it certain that the interest of the lessee to the right of way did not attach until after application, acceptance, and approval of the application by the Secretary. In other words, I had the general impression from reading the section that the section itself granted the right of way.

Mr. SINNOTT. Automatically?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I think not.

Mr. ANDERSON. I may be in error about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That any permit, lease, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to permit, upon such terms as he may determine to be just, for joint or several use, such easements or rights of way, including easements in tunnels upon, through, or in the lands leased, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same, or of other lands containing the deposits described in this act, and the treatment and shipment of the products thereof by or under authority of the Government, its lessees, or permittees, and for other public purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided further, That if such reservation is made it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease: And provided further, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the chairman of the committee if it is contemplated under this provision that the easements and rights of way over the public domain shall be granted without compensation?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; for this purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON. An easement under a general provision of this kind might be a very valuable right, might it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. It would only be valuable in connection with the operation of the property.

Mr. ANDERSON. And such an easement, of course, might very materially decrease the value of the public lands upon which it was granted.

Mr. SINNOTT. Of course the lessee is paying for that right of way when he leases his property, paying for it in his bid and his royalty. Like a railroad employee who gets a pass over the railroad, he really does not get a free pass. He pays for it in his daily employment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then the gentleman asserts that the words "upon such terms as he may determine to be just," in line 25, on page 68, and line 1, on page 69, do not include a reasonable charge for the value of the use of the right of way?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think those words are broad enough to permit the Secretary to make a charge. My attention was not on that precise language.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wanted the gentleman's opinion that the language was broad enough to authorize a charge.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it is.

Mr. ANDERSON. Because I desired to offer an amendment, unless I could have the gentleman's assurance that he did think that language was broad enough to cover a charge.

Mr. SINNOTT. I was called away while the section was being read, and did not have that exact language in mind. I think it is broad enough to cover that.

Mr. ANDERSON. With that assurance of the chairman of the committee, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Oregon if it is intended to have a night session on this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Not to-night.

Mr. WALSH. The shades of night are falling fast, and we have had a pretty good exemplification of a strenuous day——

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BANKS IN NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. BAER. In relation to an alleged bank failure at Fargo, N. Dak. I think it will be of interest.

Mr. GARD. Is the gentleman's request for a moment or for a minute?

Mr. BAER. For a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago a press dispatch sent out from Fargo, N. Dak., and widely published under glaring headlines, proclaimed that the Scandinavian-American Bank of that city was closed because of being insolvent. Later the newspapers in the Northwest qualified the statement by saying the bank was "alleged" to be insolvent. The fact of the matter is that the bank was never insolvent.

At the outset, let me make it clear that the Scandinavian-American Bank is a private institution and must not be confused with the state Bank of North Dakota, which is now organized with a capital of $2,000,000 and has deposits amounting to $13,000,000. Many newspapers, intentionally or unintentionally, led the public to believe that the bank which was alleged to be insolvent was the State-owned Bank of North Dakota, established by a constitutional amendment, ratified at two elections by the majority of the people. I wish that I had the time to comment on the success of this new State institution, which embraces features of the Federal reserve bank and the farm-loan bank. It has a wonderful record. Mr. F. W. Cathro, director general of the bank, recently stated in a report that the bank has earned more than $40,000 in the seventy-odd days it has been doing business. It has not only made this profit but it has had a great tendency to reduce the interest of first farm mortgages throughout the State. This bank has been created solely for public service and makes no unsecured loans. Consequently any charges made against the State bank are absolutely false.

At the time that the Scandinavian-American Bank was closed, the State bank examiner was out of the State on official business at the request of the attorney general. The attorney general, allying himself with another member of the banking board, formed a political plot to close up the institution, in order to discredit the Nonpartisan League, many members of which had notes in this bank. In the absence of the State bank examiner they used an incompetent deputy to carry out their designs. I say "incompetent" because he overlooked thousands of dollars in collateral which was deposited in the bank. The reports of this deputy, whose name is Halldorson, either were the outgrowth of the grossest bias or the rankest incompetence, for when Mr. Thatcher, an expert auditor of the Equitable Audit Co., of St. Paul, checked up the Scandinavian-American Bank he declared that it was in sound going condition at the time it was closed. Without checking up the total amount of collateral, Mr. Halldorson said that the bank was "hopelessly insolvent." Mr. Thatcher pointed out that collections were $217,000 since Halldorson made his report, and that loans and discounts had been reduced by $191,000 since the attorney general's crew were ousted from the bank, proving the assets of the institution were exceptionally liquid. Mr. Thatcher showed the sound business policy accompanying the loans made by the bank and the manner in which the loans were paid out. "To-day the cash reserve of the bank is 220 per cent of the requirements," he said. "The total reserve is 160 per cent of the requirements. I wish to state that the bank is not only solvent, but it has its capital and surplus intact and it has accumulated net profits of $10,000."

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that certain papers played up this false report of the bank being insolvent at the time, but they have been profoundly silent since dispatches came from Fargo stating that the bank had been reopened last Saturday, after a decision of the supreme court, which declared that the bank had never been insolvent. The court ousted the attorney general and his "pretenders." Upon his return, the State bank examiner, Mr. Lofthus, investigated the bank and in his report stated: "I am satisfied that this bank is not only solvent, but also retains its surplus and some undivided profits. Considering the interests of the bank patrons, the stockholders, and the credit of the State of North Dakota, and knowing that the bank is solvent and is in a condition to resume business, it is my opinion that it should be opened and allowed to resume business."

In addition to the reduction in the loans, Mr. Lofthus found the reserve of the institution $85,000 above the amount required in addition to the bank's holding of $50,000 in Liberty bonds. He asserted that Halldorson had sent out deceptive statements regarding the bank's condition because in the time he examined the institution "he could not have obtained a sufficient knowledge of the financial status to qualify him to properly pass judgment on the bank's solvency."

In view of these statements of such responsible officials I think it unnecessary for my going into details concerning this dastardly attempt to wreck a perfectly sound institution. The infamous effort of the obstructionists of a great movement of the people was an attempt to break its financial backbone by foreclosing just before harvest. It failed.

Last Tuesday a tremendous mass meeting was held in the huge auditorium at Fargo, which in spite of its great capacity was totally inadequate to accommodate the crowd, necessitating the holding of an overflow meeting. Hon. Lynn J. Frazier, governor of the State; President A. C. Townley, of the Nonpartisan League; and other prominent men addressed the enthusiastic multitude and were greeted time and time again with thunderous applause, in which were mingled cries of "We'll stick; we are not broke yet."

At midnight, at the conclusion of this tremendous gathering, there was presented the unusual spectacle of hundreds of farmers lined up in front of an institution alleged to be insolvent, not for the purpose of making a "run" on the bank, but for the purpose of making a run to deposit their thousands of dollars in actual cash, as an indication of their faith in the solvency of the institution. This is the most unique spectacle in American history, an example of a bank where depositors, in spite of false reports, showed their unswerving confidence in its stability and registered their contempt for the tactics of the conspirators.

While their sentiment was more substantially demonstrated by the bushels of money that were actually piled up on the bank floors the following resolutions well express the spirit of the meeting:

Be it resolved, That we, the farmers of North Dakota in mass convention assembled in Fargo on this 21st day of October, 1919, hereby unite in setting forth for the benefit of the people of the United States the facts in the plot which resulted in the temporary closing of the Scandinavian-American Bank of Fargo.

Five years ago there began in the State of North Dakota an organization which has continually, insistently, and successfully harassed and attacked the methods of the monopolistic business parasites, and during the past five years it has been the hope and the dream of the grain speculator, the unnecessary middle man, and the monopolistic business parasites that they might awake to find the Nonpartisan League had met with disaster; that its newspapers had been wiped out; that the farmers' banks had been wrecked; that the farmers' stores had been closed; and that the farmers' program of progress had been set back half a century. They have not only dreamed but they have organized and concentrated their publicity, political, and financial forces to bring about this result. Having tried the test of political strength, the test of economic strength, the test of false accusation, and every test which they could devise to destroy this great movement and having failed, they finally changed their plans and used the only weapon which has invariably proved successful for them and their kind—money power.

For some months past the chamber of commerce barons, the milling magnates, the railroad dictators, and the great financial kings have planned together day by day to bring upon the farmers' movement disaster from all sides. They have enlisted in their cause by fair means or foul three men in whom the people of North Dakota had placed their faith, and working with those men they have planned to refuse to cash paper issued by farmers' banks, to refuse to loan money to farmers' institutions, to make farmers' notes and farmers' checks valueless, to cause runs on farmers' banks, to destroy farmers' newspapers, to wipe out the Nonpartisan League and all it stands for, to stop the building of mills and elevators in North Dakota. They have prepared and sent out through all the news channels of the United States of America the message that a great fraud has been exposed, that the farmers' movement has failed, and that the State of North Dakota is bankrupt. They have been willing to go to any lengths to gain their ends, and in this malign attempt to crush the very heart of democracy in the State of North Dakota their chief work has been done by men who were trusted by the people of the State; men who have stooped to any act, no matter how low; men who stood ready to and did violate any law; men who are daily violating their oath of office; men who apparently retain no respect for themselves, their name, or their families; men who listen no longer to the desire of their constituents; men who are willing to destroy the whole future of true democracy in order to satiate their selfish political desires, and in their reckless pursuit of their program of destruction they have unlawfully and unjustly attempted to destroy this safe, sound, and solvent bank, the leading farmers' bank of North Dakota—the Scandinavian-American.

Now, therefore, we do hereby resolve:

First. That we call upon our fellow citizens, the people of the State of North Dakota to stand fast in support of their institutions and the program of progress to which their State has committed herself, to believe no false charges made against the State, to have faith in their movement and stand unfaltering, shoulder to shoulder, to answer back the enemies of this great movement by coming forward and making the Scandinavian-American Bank of Fargo the biggest bank in the State, both in capital and surplus and in business conducted by it.

Second. That whereas in the face of the unfaithfulness of Langer, Hall, and Kositzky, in the face of all their political trickery, and in the face of all the obstacles that have been raised, Lynn J. Frazier, governor, and John N. Hagan, commissioner of agriculture and labor, have remained faithful to the cause of the people of the State and have made possible the splendid success which the State is achieving in its progressive work; Therefore be it further

Resolved, That we tender to Lynn J. Frazier, and John N. Hagan our most heartfelt thanks for the tireless, self-sacrificing fight they have made in spite of heart-breaking opposition and that we assure them of our unbounded love and admiration for what they have done and pledge them our devoted cooperation in carrying through to a finish the work they have so splendidly begun against such heavy odds; and be it further Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be made, attested as correct by the secretary of this convention, and presented to Gov. Frazier and Commissioner Hagan.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. CONNALLY, and Mr. JONES of Texas were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one day.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next at 2 o'clock the House stand in recess not to exceed 30 minutes——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, where a veto message comes from the President of the United States to the House is it not in order to have it submitted at once?

The SPEAKER. It is; it is within the discretion of the Chair. The Chair was about to submit it, but thought that he would have these minor matters cleared up first.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, may I submit my request, as the gentleman objected before he heard it? I ask unanimous consent that the House recess next Thursday at 2 o'clock for 15 minutes, the purpose being at that time to present to Gen. McCain a silver cup——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. RAKER. On the rank for nurses in the Army. It is in reference to a bill I have before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SANFORD. I object.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt; and

H. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Amherst W. Barber;

S. 2250. An act providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam;

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.; and

S. 3190. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt; and

H. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

PROHIBITION.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning, without my signature, H. R. 6810, "An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries."

The subject matter treated in this measure deals with two distinct phases of the prohibition legislation. One part of the act under consideration seeks to enforce war-time prohibition. The other provides for the enforcement which was made necessary by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

It will not be difficult for Congress in considering this important matter to separate these two questions and effectively to legislate regarding them, making the proper distinction between temporary causes which arose out of war-time emergencies and those like the constitutional amendment of prohibition which is now part of the fundamental law of the country. In all matters having to do with the personal habits and customs of large numbers of our people we must be certain that the established processes of legal change are followed. In no other way can the salutary object sought to be accomplished by great reforms of this character be made satisfactory and permanent.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
27 October, 1919.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the consideration of the message vetoing the bill H. R. 6810, the national prohibition bill, be postponed until next Thursday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion to postpone on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the consideration of the veto message be postponed until next Thursday, and the gentleman from Massachusetts moves to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If the motion to lay on the table is not carried would that force an immediate vote on the matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to lay the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 14 ayes and 63 noes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. MADDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 24 ayes and 46 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that no quorum is present. It is obvious that no quorum is present, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to lay the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota on the table. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 30, nays 184, answered "present" 2, not voting 215, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. POU (for) with Mr. ANTHONY (against).

Mr. ACKERMAN with Mr. VENABLE.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. WEAVER.

Mr. BRITTEN with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania with Mr. O'CONNELL.

Mr. BURDICK with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas with Mr. YOUNG of Texas.

Mr. CLASSON with Mr. WEBB.

Mr. DALLINGER with Mr. PADGETT.

Mr. DEMPSEY with Mr. OVERSTREET.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. DYER with Mr. MANSFIELD.

Mr. FOSTER with Mr. MCDUFFIE.

Mr. FREAR with Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. FREEMAN with Mr. KETTNER.

Mr. FRENCH with Mr. HOWARD.

Mr. GOODALL with Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ with Mr. EVANS of Nebraska.

Mr. GRIEST with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. HAYS with Mr. CASEY.

Mr. HERSEY with Mr. CARTER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to postpone until Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be recognized?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will withdraw the motion at this time. There are so many——

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order—— [Cries of "Vote!"] I make the point of order that the gentleman can not withdraw the motion at this time. The House has already made a decision on it by refusing to lay on the table, and therefore under the rule the gentleman is not in a position to withdraw it. If the Chair is in doubt, I can give him the authority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been referred to a precedent which sustains the point made by the gentleman from New York, and accordingly the Chair sustains the point of order that the gentleman from Minnesota has not the right to withdraw it; consequently the question is——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the motion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question first. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to postpone until Thursday——

Mr. BLANTON. But I offer a substitute, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. For the gentleman's motion, that we vote on the President's veto now.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet and I was demanding recognition at the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion to postpone——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that a motion to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. MONDELL. A motion to postpone is debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts refer the Chair to any decision? The Chair is referred to a decision saying that a motion to postpone to a day certain is debatable within very narrow limits only and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming within very narrow limits. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we have a very important matter before us for consideration, important in its bearing on the welfare of the Nation, important because of the fact that a bill long considered by the Congress has been vetoed by the President. Under these circumstances it is proper and fitting that we shall defer consideration of the matter long enough to allow the entire membership of the House to get here [applause] and to a time when we shall have sufficient opportunity properly to consider the matter before us and to pass upon it intelligently. If we attempt to take the bill up prior to the time suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota we shall first have the special order and proceedings for to-morrow interfered with. If we attempt to take the message up to-morrow we shall have the question of Calendar Wednesday raised. To avoid those questions and take up the measure at the very earliest moment, when it can be taken up in the presence of the full membership of the House and be fully considered——

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The consideration should be deferred to Thursday, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, and I move the previous question on his motion.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman was not recognized to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to postpone until Thursday.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 66.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If the motion to postpone to a certain day is voted down, does that mean the immediate consideration of the President's veto message which the Speaker has laid before the House?

The SPEAKER. It does, unless some other action is taken.

Mr. WINGO. If that is voted down, the only motion that would be in order would be either to lay on the table or to refer to a committee?

The SPEAKER. Or to adjourn.

Mr. WINGO. Or to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The Chair does not wish to limit himself, however.

Mr. WINGO. Some of the gentlemen were in a quandary as to what the parliamentary situation was.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, would those on the other side, besides the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], now have an opportunity to make a speech?

Mr. WINGO. I made no speech. The information is just as valuable to the gentleman from Missouri as to anyone else.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to postpone until Thursday.

The question was taken and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. IGOE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 98.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am judging by the vote.

The SPEAKER. That is not material. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and four gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to postpone until Thursday will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 136, answered "present" 1, not voting 211, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion before the House is, Will the House pass the bill on reconsideration, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to say——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he ought to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE]. The gentleman was addressing the Chair. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 162.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this House is anxious to discuss this question. [Cries of "Vote!"] It has been discussed over and over again. It has been voted upon in this House time and time again, and in seems to me that in view of the situation there is no occasion for prolonging the discussion.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is absolutely no new question. The same question has been decided before. It is the same question that we have decided here on the floor before.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman does not think there is any need for discussion. May I ask him why, a short while ago, if there is no reason for discussion or reconsideration, he asked that it be laid over until Thursday? Why did the gentleman ask a few moments ago that it be laid over until Thursday?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move the previous question.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman decline to answer?

The SPEAKER. Apparently the gentleman declines to answer.

Mr. IGOE. That is all right if the RECORD shows it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] demands the previous question. The question is on agreeing to the motion for the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. IGOE. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 161, noes 38.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman's point is dilatory.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No. It is obvious. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair counts 223 gentleman. A quorum is present. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? On this the Constitution requires a roll call. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of passing the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 175, nays 55, answered "present" 3, not voting 198, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the pairs.

The Clerk announced the pairs, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina and Mr. McDUFFIE (yea) with Mr. HAMILL (no).

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. RAINEY of Alabama (yea) with Mr. RIORDAN (no).

Mr. COOPER and Mr. MURPHY (yea) with Mr. SCULLY (no).

Mr. COLE and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (yea) with Mr. LONGWORTH (no).

Mr. TEMPLE and Mr. HULINGS (yea) with Mr. CRAGO (no).

Mr. STINESS and Mr. THOMAS (yea) with Mr. BURDICK (no).

Mr. WISE and Mr. OVERSTREET (yea) with Mr. CULLEN (no).

Mr. DEMPSEY and Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas (yea) with Mr. BACHARACH (no).

Mr. HOLLAND and Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi (yea) with Mr. MINAHAN (no).

Mr. TINCHER and Mr. LITTLE (yea) with Mr. LAZARO (no).

Mr. BURROUGHS and Mr. FESS (yea) with Mr. GALLIVAN (no).

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. ALEXANDER (yea) with Mr. COADY (no).

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. McKEOWN (yea) with Mr. DONOVAN (no).

Mr. SISSON and Mr. McCLINTIC (yea) with Mr. JOHNSON of New York (no).

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania and Mr. SIMS (yea) with Mr. McANDREWS (no).

Mr. MOORE of Virginia and Mr. Bell of Georgia (yea) with Mr. SMITH of New York (no).

Mr. HERSEY and Mr. WOOD of Indiana (yea) with Mr. KAHN (no).

Mr. TOWNER and Mr. WHITE of Maine (yea) with Mr. RODENBERG (no).

So, two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the bill was passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Practically.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman was present and listening when his name was called he does not qualify.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I vote "present," Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no discretion to allow the gentleman to vote at all.

SEVERAL MEMBERS inquired how they were recorded.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, what is the necessity of gentlemen who voted one way or the other coming up and asking how they are recorded?

The SPEAKER. It is quite irregular. There is no occasion to distrust the record. It can be changed in the morning, if necessary.

Mr. GARD. There are 30 or 40 of them doing that.

The SPEAKER. It takes the time of the House and is quite irregular. If gentlemen wish to change their votes, of course they have that privilege.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know how I am recorded.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I was not.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be paired.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman was present and listening when his name was called he can not vote.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. I am not asking to vote. I am simply asking to be paired.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter to be arranged with the pair clerk.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. I wish to know if gentlemen who are informed by the Chair that they can not vote because they were not present and listening when their names were called may still answer "present," so as to be included in the number necessary to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. There is a quorum present.

The result was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BLANTON. I move that the vote by which the bill was passed over the President's veto be reconsidered, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

THE FIRST DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill H. R. 9205, the first deficiency bill, for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 10, 12, 28, 31, 34, 35, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 55, 62, 63, 64, 72, and 73.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 7, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 36, 37, 38, 39, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 58, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

"Authority is hereby granted the Director of the Council of National Defense to expend during the fiscal year 1920 the sum of $32,000 from the funds now to the credit of the Committee on Public Information for necessary expenses incurred therefor since July 1, 1919, and for the expenses of auditing and closing the accounts and affairs of said committee. All unexpended balances of appropriations for and allotments to the Committee on Public Information shall remain available for payment under the direction of the Director of the Council of National Defense of such liabilities as were actually and necessarily incurred by the committee prior to June 30, 1919: Provided, That $1,000,000 of such appropriations and allotments shall be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "continuing" and insert in lieu thereof the word "completing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "Ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Five" and, in line 6, strike out "$1,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after line 15; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,863,176"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

"Ordnance reservation civilian schools: Authority is granted for the expenditure during the fiscal year 1920 of not to exceed $45,000 from appropriations heretofore made for the 'purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon,' for the operation and maintenance on ordnance reservations at Amatol and Mays Landing, N. J.; Nitro, W. Va.; Jacksonville, Tenn.; Penniman, Va.; Sheffield and Muscle Shoals, Ala.; and Tullytown, Pa., of schools for children of persons employed thereon, where public schools are not conveniently available for such children, including salaries, supplies, stationery, and industrial work, replacement and repair of books and equipment, and all incidental and necessary expenses in connection therewith."

On page 11 of the bill, in line 10, strike out "1919" and insert in lieu thereof "1910."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 47: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 47, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT.

"Rent: For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, fiscal year 1919, $175."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$6,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter, inserted by said amendment, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500," and in line 4 strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$333.34"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3, of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and in line 5 strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and in line 3 strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 65: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$45,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF LABOR.

"For salaries and expenses of the international conference of labor, as follows:

"United States Government executive staff: For two and one-half months, at monthly compensation as follows: Assistant to the secretary, $450; first assistant, $300; three executive assistants, at $200 each; two assistants at hotels, at $200 each; private secretary, $200; two stenographers, at $150 each; typist, $125; and two messengers, at $75 each; in all, $6,312.50.

"Conference staff, for two months, at monthly compensation as follows: Two stenographers, at $150 each; two deputy secretaries, at $300 each; four subsecretaries (for commissions), at $200 each; four interpreters, at $200 each; three English-French translators, at $200 each; three French-English translators, at $200 each; six French stenographers, at $83.33 each; six English stenographers, at $150 each; chief messenger, $125; eight messengers, at $75 each; expenses, at not exceeding $10 per diem for each person, $12,000; in all, $23,649.96."

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, namely:

On No. 1: Strikes out the paragraph, inserted by the Senate, requiring the executive departments and independent establishments to report each proposed new activity or investigation to the Bureau of Efficiency, and also the paragraph directing the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate the methods of business in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

On No. 2: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, relative to the closing up of the accounts of the Committee on Public Information, modified so as to authorize the use of $32,000 of unexpended balances for expenses incident to the work during the fiscal year 1920, and covers into the Treasury $1,000,000 of the unexpended balances of appropriations and allotments.

On Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6, relating to the District of Columbia: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for sewer construction work for 1919 and makes them available for 1920; appropriates $19,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the upper Potomac interceptor; inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, increasing from 20 per cent to 33⅓ per cent the amount of the appropriation for community forums and civic centers which may be expended for the payment of secretaries, teachers, organizers, and clerks; and appropriates $800 instead of $1,600, as proposed by the Senate, for charwomen for the new courthouse.

On No. 7: Appropriates $2,900, as proposed by the Senate, for the Columbia Hospital.

On No. 8: Appropriates $5,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the vocational rehabilitation of soldiers and sailors, and strikes out that portion of the amendment authorizing the transfer from the War Department to the Federal Board for Vocational Education of certain equipment valued approximately at $250,000.

On Nos. 9, 10, 11, and 12, relating to the State Department: Appropriates $200,000, instead of $100,000 as proposed by the House and $461,666.67 as proposed by the Senate, for additional officers and employees; appropriates $4,140.28, as proposed by the Senate, to provide for compensation of the ambassador to Belgium; strikes out the increase of $200,000, proposed by the Senate, in the appropriation to reimburse the fund "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, fiscal year 1920," on account of the expenses of the American mission to negotiate peace.

On Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22: Appropriates for certain additional employees in the Treasury Department from November 1, 1919, as proposed by the Senate, instead of from October 1, 1919, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, relating to public buildings: Increases the amount which may be expended during the fiscal year 1920 for repairs on Treasury Department buildings in the District of Columbia from $16,000 to $21,000, as proposed by the Senate; appropriates $2,800 additional for the purchase of a post-office site at Mount Olive, N. C.; appropriates $3,000 for rent of quarters at Nashville, Tenn.; appropriates $1,500 for rent of quarters at Newport, R. I., and $125,000 for additional construction at the Cape Charles, Va., quarantine station, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 28 and 29, relating to the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department: Strikes out the increase of $25,000, proposed by the Senate, and inserts the proviso, proposed by the Senate, authorizing a maximum pay of $12 per day to not to exceed three persons.

On No. 30: Appropriates $136,813.94, as proposed by the Senate, for additional employees in the Office of the Treasurer, to be employed in redeeming national currency.

On Nos. 31, 32, and 33, relating to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance: Strikes out the appropriation of $1,000,000, proposed by the Senate, for advertising, and inserts the appropriation of $161,536 for the purchase of addressograph supplies, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 34. Strikes out the appropriation of $31,000, as proposed by the Senate, for telephone lines for the Coast Guard.

On No. 35: Strikes out the appropriation of $55,000, proposed by the Senate, for additional scales for the Customs Service.

On No. 36: Inserts the paragraph, as proposed by the Senate, requiring the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish two copies of each of its publications free of charge to the National Library for the Blind.

On No. 37: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, establishing a credit of $147 in the accounts of C. G. Duganne, formerly disbursing officer of the Reclamation Service at Denver, Colo.

On No. 38: Appropriates $550, as proposed by the Senate, to credit the accounts of Sydney E. Smith, disbursing clerk of the War Department.

On No. 39: Inserts the language, proposed by the Senate, making the appropriation for contingent expenses of the War Department available for heating apparatus and repairs to buildings occupied by the War Department other than the State, War, and Navy Building.

On No. 40: Strikes out the appropriation of $200,000 for continuing the construction of the Aqueduct Bridge.

On No. 41: Restores the language, stricken out by the Senate, authorizing the maintenance of schools on Army ordnance reservations, modified so as to authorize the use of $45,000 instead of $64,000, as proposed by the House, and specifies the places at which schools may be maintained.

This amendment also corrects an error in the text of the bill by properly identifying a reference to the river and harbor appropriation act of June 25, 1910.

On No. 42: Strikes out the appropriation of $35,000, proposed by the Senate, for the purchase of a bridge across the Missouri River at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

On No. 43: Strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the expenditure of $13,872 for the purchase of certain land at Camp McClellan, Ala.

On No. 44: Strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the expenditure during the fiscal year 1920 of $15,681,350 of unexpended balances of appropriations made during the fiscal years 1918 and 1919 for the Air Service of the Army.

On Nos. 45, 46, 47, and 48, relating to the Navy Department: Strikes out the appropriation, proposed by the Senate, for increases in compensation of draftsmen and engravers in the Hydrographic Office; strikes out the paragraphs, proposed by the Senate, authorizing certain expenditures in the office of the Naval Records and Library; inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, appropriating $175 for rent of quarters; and inserts the appropriation of $6,289.94, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of claims for damages which have been adjusted by the Secretary of the Navy in accordance with existing law.

On No. 49: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the paragraph authorizing the transfer of $9,300,000 from appropriations for "Pay of the Navy" and "Provisions of the Navy" for the fiscal year 1920 to other bureaus of the Navy Department for work in connection with the repair of vessels.

On No. 50: Reduces from $800,000 to $500,000, as proposed by the Senate, the amount which may be expended from the appropriation "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," for pay of classified employees.

On No. 51: Appropriates $3,500, as proposed by the Senate, for repair of an annex to the Senate folding room.

On No. 52: Appropriates $160,000, as proposed by the Senate, for expenses incurred in protecting timber on the public land from forest fires.

On Nos. 53, 54, and 55, relating to the Patent Office: Appropriates for additional employees from November 1, 1919, as proposed by the Senate, instead of from October 1, 1919, as proposed by the House, and strikes out the appropriation of $7,333.34 for additional employees to bring up to date the trade-mark work of that office.

On No 56: Appropriates $6,000,000, instead of $17,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, for continuing the construction of the Alaskan Railroad.

On Nos. 57 and 58, relating to the Postal Service: Appropriates $750,000 for compensation of clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, as proposed by the Senate, and appropriates $700,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $300,000, as proposed by the House, for the payment of limited indemnity on mail matter for the fiscal year 1919.

On Nos. 59, 60, 61, 62, and 63, relating to the Department of Justice: Increases the compensation of the chief clerk at the rate of $500 per annum instead of at the rate of $1,000 per annum, as proposed by the Senate; increases the compensation of the private secretary and assistant to the Attorney General, and the attorney in charge of pardons, at the rate of $600 each, instead of at the rate of $1,000 each as proposed by the Senate; strikes out the appropriation of $5,000 proposed by the Senate, for additional motor vehicles; and strikes out the authority, proposed by the Senate, for the purchase and maintenance of motor vehicles in connection with the detection and prosecution of crimes.

On No. 64: Strikes out the appropriation of $2,000, proposed by the Senate, for the payment of a United States district attorney of Portland, Oreg., for services rendered during the years 1916 and 1917.

On No. 65: Appropriates $45,000, instead of $25,000 as proposed by the House and $70,000 as proposed by the Senate, for the control and prevention of the spread of the Japanese beetle.

On No. 66: Appropriates $2,950,000 as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,500,000 as proposed by the House, for expenses of the Forest Service in fighting and preventing forest fires.

On No. 67: Strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the House, authorizing the purchase and maintenance of a motor vehicle for the official use of the Director of the Census.

On Nos. 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72, relating to the Coast and Geodetic Survey: Strikes out the appropriation of $12,000, proposed by the House, to increase the compensation of draftsmen; strikes out the appropriation of $5,000, proposed by the House, to increase the compensation of engravers; strikes out the appropriation of $35,622.23, proposed by the Senate, to increase the compensation of draftsmen, engravers, computers, lithographers, transferrers, pressmen, plate printers, and certain other employees; appropriates for additional draftsmen and other employees from November 1, 1919, as proposed by the Senate, instead of from October 1, 1919, as proposed by the House.

On No. 73: Strikes out the appropriation of $35,000, proposed by the Senate, for expenses of the industrial conference.

On No. 74: Appropriates $64,462.46, instead of $73,212.46, as proposed by the Senate, for expenses of the international conference of labor. The Senate amendment is modified so as to increase the compensation of three English-French translators and three French-English translators from $125 to $200 per month each; to strike out the appropriation of $650 for expenses of the telegraph room; to strike out the appropriation of $10,000 for expenses of moving departments to provide offices; to insert an appropriation of $1,000 for contingent expenses; and to insert a proviso prohibiting the use of any other appropriation to supplement the funds granted in the bill and also prohibits the use of this or any other appropriation for the expenses of telegraphing or cabling proceedings of the conference.

On No. 75: Appropriates $1,075, instead of $2,150 as proposed by the Senate, for the compensation of statutory employees of the Botanic Garden.

On Nos. 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, and 81, relating to the Senate: Appropriates for the compensation of employees and for other expenses of the Senate in the manner and amounts proposed by each of the Senate amendments.

On No. 82: Appropriates $9,303.95 for the payment of judgments of United States courts which were certified to Congress after the bill had passed the House.

On Nos. 84 and 85: Appropriates $1,160,333.82 and $353,920.50, respectively, for the payment of audited claims which were certified to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury after the bill had passed the House.

On No. 86: Corrects a section number of the bill.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report just presented.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri reserves all points of order on the conference report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement by the governor of Illinois approving the President's statement on the coal situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the matter stated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the governor of Illinois approves the President's statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But suppose he did not approve it?

Mr. BLANTON. Then I would have objected to it.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 28, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Also, petition of Abingdon Retail Merchants' Association, Abingdon, Ill., urging enactment of such legislation as will encourage production and discourage abnormal demand, and in particular a limited embargo upon exports, prohibition of resales between distributors, limiting board of trade trading to actual delivery, and permitting only producers or distributors of food to deal in same; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of retail merchant's department, Pekin, Ill., urging enactment of such legislation as will encourage production and discourage abnormal demand, and in particular a limited embargo upon exports, prohibition of resales between distributors, limiting board of trade trading to actual delivery, and permitting only producers or distributers of food to deal in same; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 28, 1919.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, October 22, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., October 28, 1919.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. IRVINE L. LENROOT, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President Pro Tempore.

Mr. LENROOT thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, last evening I presented the conference report on House bill 9205, the first deficiency appropriation bill. I find on an examination that slight errors have been made in the report, and I ask leave to withdraw it for correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is upon the adoption of the amendment in the form of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Ball	Hale	McKellar	Smoot
Bankhead	Harding	McLean	Spencer
Borah	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Sutherland
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Swanson
Capper	Hitchcock	New	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Townsend
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Trammell
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Wadsworth
Dial	Kendrick	Penrose	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Keyes	Pomerene	Warren
Fernald	King	Robinson	Watson
Fletcher	Kirby	Sheppard	Williams
France	Knox	Shields	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Simmons
Gay	Lenroot	Smith, Ariz.
Gerry	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained by illness in their families. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, in these times of social upheaval and unbridled radicalism, when old standards of justice and right are distinctly scattered to the winds, I think the voice of any organized society calling out through the din of frenzied clamor for sobriety and sanity of both word and action is most timely.

I therefore present and ask to have read a resolution of the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America, which has lately been in session in the city of Washington and only closed its labors yesterday. The resolution is very short and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Whereas the Great War has disturbed old conditions and relations between men, and

"Whereas the transition period is fraught with danger to our country and its institutions through precipitate judgment and ill digested remedial measures on the part of the few but mostly through the indifference and apathy of the many, and

"Whereas fanatical visionaries and criminal intelligence with baser motives have seized this opportunity to promulgate their doctrines of force and direct action regardless of right; now be it

"Resolved, That the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America, assembled in biennial session, does now reaffirm its ancient doctrine and repeat its belief in:

"The fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; that justice, truth, and equity should govern all human actions; and above all, the need of organized government and constituted authority to express the will of the people, for the people, and by the people, as distinguished from all forms of anarchy and mob rule;

"That we commend in the highest terms the efforts of the President and the Congress of the United States of America to maintain the fundamental principles as proclaimed in the Constitution.

"It further calls on all its subordinate bodies to read this resolution to their members when next assembled and to pledge them collectively and individually to the support of its purpose to maintain sane and reasoned judgment on all public questions, that our liberties and rights as Americans may be preserved and the freedom and dignity of our country be upheld."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the New York Times of last Sunday entitled "Six to Six in the League."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH AND AMERICAN VOTES 6 TO 6 IN THE LEAGUE—OUR POWER IN ASSEMBLY EQUALS BRITISH ASIDE FROM JOHNSON AMENDMENT.

[By Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart.]

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., October 17, 1919.

To the Editor of the New York Times:

The discussion on the league of nations during the last six months has been nothing short of a public education. Millions of people have learned the meaning of such obscure terms as "covenant," "league," "ratification," "reservation," "amendment," "interpretation," "mandatory," "existing political independence," "arbitration," and "inquiry." Never since the Federal Constitution was on the knees of the gods a century and a third ago have the American people so carefully studied a document and so anxiously listened to arguments upon its meaning and its application to the future welfare of the country.

Therefore every intelligent person is aware that the league of nations does not contain the section under which the Japanese have become possessed of "rights" as a nation to own railroads and coal mines and to control the commerce of Shantung, which Germany took from China 20 years ago by the "rights" of robbery; that matter is introduced into the closely interwoven treaty with Germany. Everybody knows also that the famous article 10 of the league of nations, by which "the members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence * * * of all members of the league," is a more moderate and guarded statement than in the original form of the league, and does not bind the United States to go to war or to take any steps dangerous to its own security.

The public, however, does not understand so clearly that the league of nations nowhere in terms gives to Great Britain any other or greater authority in the affairs of the league than any other nation. The "annex" to the covenant includes five communities that are thus accepted as "original members of the league of nations, signatories of the treaty of peace." Since under article 3 "the assembly shall consist of representatives of the members of the league" and "at meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote," it is true that representatives from within the British Empire may if they all agree cast six votes on one side or other of any question. It is true that therefore the voting weight of the population and territories composing the British Empire is six times as great in the assembly as the vote of the United States or France or China or any other great or small country.

To the mind of Senator JOHNSON this is an intolerable stigma as well as an incalculable danger to the United States. And Senator JOHNSON is so terrifically self-convinced, so absolutely given up to the task of saving his country from ruin, such a fiery Horatius at the bridge, that he leaves his audiences fairly stunned into the conviction that the league is passionately and personally unjust to the people and interests of our beloved land.

Two different lines of argument have been brought against this assertion, which has been driven into the public mind like a pile into a river bed. The first is President Wilson's riposte that it makes no difference how many votes Great Britain may cast, because the assembly is a talkfest and not a workfest. There is much in this argument. It has been evident from the beginning that the assembly was simply a means of giving to each of the constituent nations, no matter how large or how small, participation in the affairs and discussions of the league. The assembly is the parliament of the league. It furnishes the highly important opportunity for every member to bring its own grievances through its own spokesmen and to compel a hearing by the other members. It provides every nation its day in court. In addition, it offers the precious advantages of a world congressional record, for its case goes out to mankind, and at the same time every one of the signatories has a right to jump into the debates on the propositions of the other 29. Presumably the assembly will hold its meetings in public, and in any case its discussions will be no more secret than those of the United States Senate in executive session.

The assembly receives no substantive power for the ungainsayable reason that it is absolutely impossible to frame a world league upon the basis of an equal vote to every nation. No great power would possibly enter an assembly in which the combination of the votes of Bolivia, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Hedjaz, Liberia, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Siam, Uruguay, Norway, Denmark, Persia, Switzerland, and Paraguay—a total of 16, and therefore a majority of the league members—could prevail against the will of the United States of America, together with China, France, Italy, Japan, Argentine Republic, Spain, and seven small powers.

To give decisions by equal votes would make a league of nations impossible. Hence it is not unreasonable to say that no extra number of votes given to any large power would secure for that power an undue influence in the league, inasmuch as no vote of the assembly can prevail against decisions by the council upon the highly important matters committed to that body.

The second argument is that there is nothing in the text of the league or in the conditions to make it certain that the six votes will act together. The British Empire, and also Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India, each for itself, are entitled to send "representatives" of those communities. The first four are as near independent nations as is possible for any bodies of men who recognize any central authority outside themselves.

Their forms of government have, to be sure, been enacted for them by the British Government, but in every case they have practically been drawn up by the people concerned, even at the expense of a part of the authority which Great Britain has previously exercised. They all elect their own legislative bodies; they all provide themselves with a prime minister, who is virtually the head of the State; they all have a cabinet government, which will undoubtedly designate the representatives in the world assembly and will instruct them. Furthermore, each one of those four communities has a larger population and a greater likelihood of power and prestige among future nations than several of the full and independent nations. Every one is more important to the world than any of the 16 small powers mentioned above, each of which has a vote equal to that of Australia or Canada.

Two deviations from the advantage of this plan from the British point of view are India and the remaining colonies of Great Britain in the West Indies and elsewhere, which are represented only by the central British Government. That India should have a vote in the league of nations when it has none in the Parliament of the Empire and is deprived of a Parliament of its own is a real anomaly and might be a cause of grievance. To be sure, India is next after China the most populous community on the face of the earth. It has furnished a million soldiers for the World War, and without them Mesopotamia, Palestine, and Syria could not have been conquered, and probably Egypt and the Suez Canal would have been lost. At present the vote of India is not a separate and independent vote in the same sense as that of Canada. It would undoubtedly be cast by the central authority in London. Furthermore, it is altogether likely that all the five adjunct votes would join that of Great Britain on any question which raised the square issue of the British Empire as a whole against the interests of other parts of the world.

The two lines of argument just discussed alone or taken together make it reasonably certain that no danger to the United States or to the proper conduct of the world league is to be expected from the six votes which are printed in the unterrifying official form, "British Empire, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, India."

Even when the six communities all vote together they are outvoted several times over by aggregations of Central European, or Asiatic, or Latin American powers; and in any event votes in the assembly are not decisive of either the policy or the action of the league.

A third and more urgent answer to Senator JOHNSON has hitherto been left out in the cold. It has been carefully neglected by the enemies of the league, because it oversets all their appeals on this point; and the spellbinders of the league avoid it because it is based upon a disagreeable truth which it is thought indelicate to mention in political American circles. That truth may be brought out clearly by a little rearrangement and indenting of the names of a few of the "nations signatory" to the treaty of peace as follows: United States, Cuba, Panama, Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, Haiti.

The change of order simply calls attention to the fact that the United States has no right to complain that the British Empire controls five extra votes in the assembly of nations, inasmuch as the United States also controls five votes among its protectorates, and has a much greater assurance that nobody will break away from the gang. Considering the result of the Spanish War in bringing in territory, and the confidence of the American people that they can govern their small neighbors much better than those neighbors can govern themselves, it is singular that neither Government officials nor critics of public affairs are willing to come out in the open. Why not own that the United States, in addition to its tropical colonies of the Philippine Islands, Pacific Islands, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, controls firmly established protectorates in five of the nearby Caribbean and Central American States. This modesty or obstinacy is the more remarkable in view of the fact that the paramount influence of the United States in those five countries is a line of policy steadily followed by four successive Presidents; that it has been confirmed in every case by treaties duly ratified by the Senate; and that Congress has without a whimper provided the troops necessary to keep the protectorates contented.

This formal policy of American protectorates began with the appearance of the American Army in Cuba in 1898, followed by an occupation of several years under the authority of President McKinley. Next came the Roosevelt Panama Treaty of 1904, which not only practically annexed the Canal Zone but left the remainder of the Republic of Panama under very direct American influence. The third case was that of Santo Domingo, occupied under orders from President Roosevelt in 1905. Nicaragua was in effect taken over under President Taft in 1911, and the transaction was confirmed by President Wilson in 1913. Haiti was occupied by American troops in 1915; as a contemporary newspaper put it, "Rear Admiral Caperton, of the United States Navy, is in complete charge of the Republic."

These were not temporary occupations, the result of attacks on the United States troops or ships or citizens or property, but a purposeful transfer of the final authority of government from the people of the five countries to the United States. This abrogation of sovereignty is expressed in the treaties made in every case, though in most instances some months or even years after the territory had come within the power of the United States Government.

In 1902 the United States declined to withdraw the troops from Cuba till the Cubans made a part of the constitution of the Cuban Republic "the Platt amendment," which was originally drafted by President Roosevelt, to the effect that Cuba would never enter into any entangling treaty or attempt to declare its independence or allow any other power to get control. Furthermore, the United States was accorded "the right to intervene" in case of danger to the Cuban Government. In 1906 to 1909 American troops did enter Cuba under orders from Washington, and our Government stands ready at any time when it appears necessary to take over the Cuban Government again for the time being.

Panama granted no such right of intervention in the canal treaty of 1904; but the Republic is so subdivided and reduced in size that it is impossible for it to act contrary to the policy of the United States. The Santo Domingo treaty, ratified by the Senate in 1907, put the collection and the distribution of the national revenue in the hands of a receiver general, who was practically an officer of the United States; and that control has never been given up. Further, the Dominican Republic promised not to increase its public dues nor to modify its tariff revenues except in agreement with the United States. In Nicaragua a small force of United States marines virtually held the country down from 1911 to 1914, when Secretary Bryan negotiated a treaty finally ratified in 1916. A series of limitations was laid down similar to those laid upon Cuba, including the statement that "The United States had the right to intervene for the preservation of Nicaraguan independence." Ten days later the Senate ratified a treaty pressed upon the Haitian Government on 24 hours' notice, by which the control of the finances of the country was taken over by the United States. Haiti agreed not to surrender any territory to any other nations, and "should the necessity occur, the United States will lend an efficient aid."

Not only has the United States thus established fiscal control over three of the five countries; it also pays a benevolent attention to their politics and internal government. Any candidate for the presidency of the Republic of Panama who is not well inclined to the United States simply does not get before the electors. In Santo Domingo there was a great uproar because Secretary Bryan urged the fiscal official practically designated by the United States, but paid out of the Dominican treasury, to make appointments from "among deserving Democrats." Cuba would undoubtedly have a very different government and probably a different President but for the watchfulness of the big neighbor across the straits, which allows only the right kind of people to carry on the affairs of Cuba. There is not one of these five countries that really has an independent government or exercise of sovereignty. There is not one of the five, except perhaps Panama, that would not abrogate the arrangement with the United States if it had genuine "self-determination."

This article is not written to criticize the protectorate policy of the Government, for it seems to be accepted by all administrations, all departments of the Government, and all parties as a necessary and proper incident of our foreign relations. In Santo Domingo and Haiti there was great danger of some kind of foreign occupation, which the United States warned away. The control of Panama is a necessary defense of the canal. Nicaragua includes a possible canal route which the United States felt it must control. Peace in Cuba was the object of the war in 1898, and must be kept now.

The significant point is that the United States can not fairly enjoy all the advantages of these protectorates and then go before the world with the cry that Great Britain has jockeyed us by securing six votes in a negative and almost powerless assembly in which we have but one vote. No one acquainted with public affairs can suppose that the representatives of Haiti, Nicaragua, Panama, the Dominican Republic, and Cuba in the world assembly will ever be hostile to the United States. Not one of them would dream of joining a league of nations without the gracious nod of Uncle Sam. Those five votes would practically be at all times in the vest pocket of the American representatives in the assembly, acting under instructions from Washington. Other nations might perhaps protest that Latin American votes were too easily influenced by the United States. Talk of India! The United States has five Indias on the Atlantic side and one on the Pacific, for no one can doubt that the Philippine Islands, when they receive their "independence," will be checked by the same kind of string as Cuba, so far as foreign policy is concerned.

Therefore, all the talk about the affront to the dignity of the United States, the giving away of our equality in the league of nations, the exaltation of British influence, is nothing but a herring across the trail. The United States is abundantly protected against British votes, if protection were needed, by its complete influence over its protectorates. In addition it has in the council of nations a position of immense power and influence. It is one of the nine large countries there represented. It is one of the privileged group of five "principal and allied associate powers," and is the richest and has the greatest military strength of the five. It is one of the three powers—Great Britain, France, and the United States—which have closed together in the intention that the world shall be both democratic and peaceful. It is the leader in the two Americas.

In view of these immense advantages in the league, what is the sense of the violent lamentation and fist shaking and hullabaloo over the six votes of the British Empire? In China, when a woman has a "nervous breakdown" she gets up on the roof of a house and "reviles" not her husband or children particularly but the world in general. That relieves her feelings and the family knows that she will come down by and by in time to cook supper.

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART.

THREATENED STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice that upon to-day I would call up and ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 120. In view, however, of the extraordinary ceremonies which are scheduled for to-day, I shall defer asking for unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution until to-morrow morning. I ask that it may lie on the table in the meantime.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will lie on the table.

PAY OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I wish to refer to an article in the Post this morning which assumes to state the contents and purpose of a bill which I introduced yesterday, the statement being that its object was to provide for the detail of soldiers of the Army to work in the coal mines. Such was not the purpose or the intent of the bill, and I do not think that its phraseology justifies that interpretation. The object to be subserved by the bill is to permit the Government to detail soldiers, if necessary, to operate the facilities and means of communication necessary for the transaction of interstate commerce. The congestion of freight, the interruption of transportation, either by rail or by other lines of communication, are matters essentially different from production. The purpose of the bill is to utilize soldiers, if necessary, to keep these lines and these facilities in operation and, incidentally, to provide the same compensation for members of the Army when they are detailed for such purpose as is paid as wages in the ordinary transaction of the business appertaining to those lines.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have read the open letter which I send to the desk, adopted by the Berkeley Defense Corps, of California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that there be read the communication referred to by him. Is there objection? If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Moved and carried that the following open letter be sent to Senator HIRAM JOHNSON:

"DEAR SIR: This body consists of more than 600 average patriotic men of Berkeley. Doubtless more than two-thirds of us have voted for you. By a unanimous vote of all members present we have, three different times, indorsed the immediate ratification of the peace treaty, including the covenant of the league of nations. At a fair test vote of Berkeley citizens, nearly 2,000 voters recently, in the proportion of more than 4 to 1, favored such ratification, fewer voting for reservations or amendments than voted for rejection. The students of the State University, representing all parts of the State and consisting largely of ex-service men, by nearly as large a vote, expressed themselves more than 5 to 1 in favor thereof. The Berkeley Post of the American Legion has declared for ratification. The California Teachers' Association has just declared therefor unanimously. So also the State convention of Civic League by a 4-to-1 vote. Public sentiment throughout the State is overwhelmingly in favor of such action. Newspapers asserting the contrary are falsifying. You certainly do not feel more comfortable in the company of Hearst and De Young than in that of Rowell, Wallace, Richardson, Van Fleet, Angelotti, Olney, and thousands like them, thoughtful leaders of your own party in this State, not forgetting Herbert Hoover, our greatest Californian. Shantung should belong to China, but a league of nations can help restore it, and rejection would enable Japan to keep it and grab more.

"The very slight power in only one of the two bodies of the league given to self-governing British colonies can not conceivably do serious harm. It gives acknowledgment to the fact that, in substance, they 'are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States.' We of the Pacific coast would be silly fools to object to Canada, Australia, and New Zealand having even much greater influence. They speak our language, think the same thoughts, share in the same ideals. Like us, they face the Pacific and its problems, face the Orient with its 'teeming millions' of yellow and brown races. In the future difficulties that may arise therefrom, those brave, English-speaking, liberty-loving white peoples are surer to be with us than is the British Government at London or even our own at Washington.

"France, Italy, and other European nations do not object to this representation in the assembly. France's statesmen are not fools, and are not treating their constituents as such. For us to ask six times the representation in the assembly that is given to our heroic sister Republic France, is in the nature of an insult to France and to our own intelligence and fairness.

"We earnestly beg you to represent Californians and therefore vote for ratification. Above all, force it to a vote."

BERKELEY DEFENSE CORPS.

BERKELEY, CALIF., October 20, 1919.

COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent to have two telegrams, which I send to the Secretary's desk, read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the telegrams referred to by him be read by the Secretary. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

LOGAN, W. VA., October 27, 1919.

Senator JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.:

We can guarantee the nonunion miners of Logan County continuing to work if no outside influence or intimidation is permitted. Our miners are well satisfied and working to full capacity. This district can produce 1,000,000 tons of coal per month. Can we depend upon the Federal Government preventing any armed invasion by union miners to compel our men to cease work?

LOGAN COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION.

PITTSBURG, KANS., October 27, 1919.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We beg of you to exert the influence within your province toward averting the contemplated strike of bituminous coal miners, scheduled for November 1. A movement of this nature at the present time would be injurious to industry and seriously inconvenience the public. Should the demands of the miners be granted, the results would be disastrous to manufacturers and contractors using skilled labor in contract work in this district.

UNITED IRON WORKERS (INC.).

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Cambridge, Worcester, West Somerville, Concord, and Everett, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless certain reservations are adopted, and praying for its separation from the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Improvement Association, of Edgemont, Ohio, praying for the inclusion in the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace and league of nations covenant of the reservations proposed in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of the Upper Peninsular Educational Association, of Marquette, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH (for Mr. CUMMINS):

A bill (S. 3319) to provide for the reimbursement of the United States for motive power, cars, and other equipment ordered for railroads and systems of transportation under Federal control, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 3320) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3321) for the improvement of the customhouse at Denver, Colo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

COLD-STORAGE REGULATIONS.

Mr. NEWBERRY (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, with his objections thereto, the House proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Amherst W. Barber;

S. 2250. An act providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam;

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.; and

S. 3190. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 10137. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I understand that the message just received from the House of Representatives relates to the passage of the national prohibition bill over the President's veto. The matter can not be laid before the Senate in executive session. I therefore ask that, as in legislative session, the message be laid before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Objection is made.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can make a motion to that effect.

Mr. STERLING. I therefore move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota moves that the Senate return to legislative session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that, I understand, is a debatable motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it is not debatable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to say to the Senator that it seems to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nebraska inform the Chair concerning the rule to the effect that the motion made by the Senator from South Dakota is debatable?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly it is a debatable motion to return to legislative session. The motion to go into executive session is not debatable, possibly, but the motion to return to legislative session is always debatable.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I desire to say just one word. I think it will take but a short time to dispose of this matter. I do not expect to discuss the question, and I know of no Senator who does. I think it can be disposed of by a vote at once, so the other proceedings of the Senate, the consideration of the treaty, will be delayed but a short time. Of course, I think we must contemplate very early action on this measure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we are here in executive session, following a recess, for the purpose of discussing the treaty and, if possible, coming to a vote upon the treaty. I hope the Senator will not at this time press this motion. I have been informed by the Senator from Massachusetts that he is under the necessity of leaving here, so that he will not be present on Saturday. I presume that naturally an effort will be made to lay the treaty aside on that day, and it is possible legislative business could then be taken up; but I trust the Senator will not attempt to displace the treaty at this time. We have been subjected to all sorts of aggravating delay in connection with the consideration of the treaty, and the country is beginning to feel that things are done for the very purpose of bringing about a delay in its discussion. The matter to which attention is called by the Senator from South Dakota is of no tremendous imminence; it is a matter of a few days——

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. I will ask the Senator if he thinks the President vetoed the bill for the purpose of interposing delay?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think he probably vetoed the bill because he believed that it was an improper bill. He followed out exactly the position he has taken before the country. I am neither criticizing nor sustaining the President at the present time in his veto, but what I am objecting to——

Mr. SMOOT. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. NELSON. I make the point of order that the question is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call attention to paragraph 7 of Rule VII, which reads:

The presiding officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is not the situation that is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is the precise situation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senate is not now in legislative session; it is in executive session. If it were in secret executive session, it would not be any more impossible to lay a legislative matter before the Senate than it is now in open executive session.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rule is very plain. It refers to "any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives" and provides that "any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose," whether it be in secret executive session, open executive session, or open legislative session. The rule further provides:

Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That rule does not cover this case. The presiding officer has no power in executive session to lay before the Senate for action legislative business; necessarily the only motion which can be made is a motion to go into legislative session, and that motion is a debatable motion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the rule is very clear that—

The presiding officer may at any time—

There is no restriction whatever—may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives—

The measure referred to by the Senator from South Dakota comes from the President and from the House of Representatives—and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose.

A motion can be made to suspend the consideration of the treaty; and, if agreed to, that suspends the executive session—

Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume, for the sake of the argument, that we were in secret executive session; it must follow that we could not consider a legislative matter in secret executive session. Now, does not the same rule apply, to wit, that if we are in executive session when a legislative matter comes before us, the first motion would be to go into legislative session?

Mr. LODGE. It is customary to receive messages from the President and from the House of Representatives when we are in secret executive session; and if this rule is invoked, they must be laid before the Senate, and the very fact of laying them before the Senate involves returning to legislative session. The privileged motion is the motion to go into executive session, and, of course, that privilege covers the motion to go out of executive session; it must cover it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator; I still have the floor, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska yields to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the rule quoted by the Senator must convince the Senate that the contention is wrong. The Senator from South Dakota has not requested and can not request that the matter be laid before the Senate, because the Senate is not in legislative session, and it can only act upon it in legislative session. The only motion he can make is the motion which he did make, to proceed to consider legislative business. After we get into legislative session, then it will be in order to ask that the message from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate; but the motion which he now makes, which is the only one that he can make, to proceed to the consideration of legislative business, is a debatable question. That is my only contention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of the opinion that subdivision 7 of Rule VII applies, so far as laying the business before the Senate is concerned, to the session of the Senate, whether in executive or legislative session, and such a motion is, therefore, in order. The Chair does not pass upon the question of whether the business can be disposed of by the Senate without returning to legislative session. That point may be raised later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To lay it before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To lay what before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill referred to by the Senator from South Dakota, together with the veto message of the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. The Senator from South Dakota——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rose to a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So did I.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut rose to make a parliamentary inquiry——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Which is a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And the Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to know what the motion was, and if the Chair——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to proceed——

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STERLING. No; the motion was——

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to make the point of order that the Senator from South Dakota did not make the motion stated by the Chair, but made a motion to return to legislative business.

Mr. STERLING. That was the motion.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the point of order that I make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I correctly understand the Chair, the pending motion is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That motion is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is debatable. The question is, Shall the Senate return to legislative business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the pending motion is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I also understand the motion to return to legislative session is for the purpose of passing on the message of the President vetoing the prohibition bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator does not mean that it is the purpose to pass the bill over the veto?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood that was the purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand so, and that is the reason why I wanted to get the Senator's idea.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion before the Senate now is merely the question of returning to legislative session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I understand. If the other motion is made, I have a point of order against that other motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Senate.

After having spoken for some time,

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask for an order, necessary at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, I yield for that purpose.

RECEPTION TO THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Chair to receive His Majesty the King of the Belgians and escort him to the Senate Chamber.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. HARDING, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. UNDERWOOD as the committee.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if it is not the purpose of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] that we shall return to legislative session that he may call up the veto message of the President, I will take my seat. I would like to inquire from the Senator if that is his purpose.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the motion made by myself is to return to legislative session, and that is the pending motion. Then I expect to ask that the prohibition bill be laid before the Senate in legislative session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my understanding of the legislative situation, and, Mr. President, before we vote on it I want to address myself to that situation.

I want to state in the beginning my position in reference to the bill that the President has just vetoed. In the first place, Mr. President, I voted against the constitutional prohibition amendment because I believed that was a question for the States to determine and not for the National Government. I believed it was better in the interest of the people of the United States that each State government should determine the question of prohibition for itself rather than that the National Government should reach that determination. Therefore I voted against the submission of the national prohibition amendment, but it was adopted by the Congress, submitted to the people, and ratified by the States. It is the law of the land, and, so far as I am concerned, although I did not believe that it was the best way to handle the temperance question, the people of the United States have agreed to it, and I am in favor of enforcing the law. I shall vote now and at all times in the future for proper and just laws to be placed on the statute books to enforce Nation-wide prohibition under the constitutional amendment. More than that, I shall vote to appropriate the money, no matter how much it costs, to give a fair opportunity to enforce the amendment. I think it is going to cost a vast deal more money out of the Public Treasury to enforce the law than some of the advocates of the law pretended it would cost. But no matter what it costs, the American people are entitled to have the law tried out, and I am in favor of appropriating the money for that purpose.

That is only one side of this question. That is the permanent law, and I stand for the enforcement of the permanent law. The people of the country have passed judgment on it, and the President of the United States stands for the enforcement of the law. But the reason why he vetoed this bill was because the men who proposed Nation-wide prohibition broke the faith. They were not true to their own proposals to the country, and the President of the United States is exactly right. His veto message should be sustained, and then the Congress should turn around and pass a law to enforce the constitutional prohibition when constitutional prohibition goes into force and effect, as it will next January.

Why do I say that these men broke the faith? Because they proclaimed to the country that they were not in favor of a drastic destruction of private business, that they were not in favor of the confiscation of private property, that they believed in giving men who were in business an opportunity to wind up their affairs, and they themselves, not the men who were engaged in the liquor business, not the men who believed that the States should determine these questions, but the advocates and proponents of constitutional nation-wide prohibition wrote into the fundamental law of this land that the amendment should not go into effect and be binding upon the people of the United States for one year after its enactment. What was the purpose? Manifestly to let the men who were engaged in the business wind up their affairs. Manifestly it was the purpose to let them dispose of the property they had on hand, so that the question of the confiscation of private property without compensation, in violation of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, should not be considered in the passage of the prohibition amendment resolution by the Congress. There is not a Senator on the floor of the Senate who does not know that that was the purpose in postponing the time for the taking effect of the Federal amendment for one year after its ratification.

We went into the war under the cry that we must take care of the soldier; and I do not combat that. The men who were defending the flag of their country were entitled to the first thought. As to whether they were protected by this legislation I know not; but under that cry it was proposed to write nation-wide prohibiion on the statute books of the United States without waiting for constitutional prohibition to take effect. The Congress adopted it, and the people of the country submitted to it, because possibly the life of the Nation might be at stake, and all, then, were prepared to sacrifice all things to support the Government, the Army, and the flag.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I sympathize with the view expressed by the Senator from Alabama to a considerable extent. I have never been satisfied in my own mind as to the constitutionality of the dry war-time prohibition act since the war ended. But I am utterly bewildered to know when the war did end. We had a message from the President day before yesterday to the miners stating that the war was not closed and therefore their contract was not at an end. Now we have a message from the President to the effect that the war-time prohibition law is void because the war has closed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the Senator from Idaho grasped the President's message.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps not. I have been unable to grasp several of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will try to make it clear to the Senator, if he will allow me. I was only leading up to the case.

During the war time Congress passed a nation-wide prohibition law that was to stay on the statute books until the war was ended and demobilization took place, and that is on the statute books to-day, unless it is unconstitutional. I see that a Federal judge on yesterday held that the act was in violation of the fifth amendment, and therefore unconstitutional. But I am not arguing that side of the question. We have on the statute books constitutional prohibition. It is in the Constitution. We have on the statute books war-time prohibition, which the President asked Congress to repeal last summer and which Congress refused to repeal. But the gentleman in charge of this bill, seeking to enforce constitutional prohibition and put on the statute books a law to enforce the constitutional amendment, and on that subject I am with them, because the law should be enforced, were not satisfied. They listened to the appeal of the extremists. They forgot abstract justice, they forgot property rights, and they wrote into this measure a provision that was to produce prohibition in the United States in that lapse or space of time resting between the expiration of war-time prohibition and the beginning of constitutional prohibition. Do I make myself clear to the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. No. The Senator is clear enough from his standpoint, but he is not arguing now what the President said in this message.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not discussing the President's message. I am discussing my viewpoint of the question.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator's viewpoint; but if this war-time prohibition act is void by reason of the fact that the war is over and demobilization has taken place, how can it be said that the war is not over with reference to those contracts which were made in contemplation of the existence of the war and which were to continue only so long as the war lasted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not going into an argument of that question; it has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. BORAH. It has a good deal to do with another case which is before the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will discuss the other case later on with the Senator. I am not going to discuss that question now.

Mr. BORAH. We have a joint resolution pending before the Senate based upon the theory that the war is still in existence so far as those contracts are concerned, and this proposition is based upon the theory that the war has ended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the Senator misunderstands the President's veto.

Mr. BORAH. I do not misunderstand the President's veto. The language is plain, whoever wrote it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The President refers to the fact that the war is over in his message, but the bill that he is vetoing does not relate to war-time prohibition.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. Here is what the President says——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about the bill. I am not talking about the President's language.

Mr. BORAH. I am talking about what the President said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I am going to make myself clear on this question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I want to ask a question in regard to this matter, if the Senator will allow me. Under the war-time prohibition act the President can issue his proclamation when the Army is demobilized and peace is declared. Whenever he issues his proclamation the first title in the prohibition bill ceases to operate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. NELSON. It is left in the hands of the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not if this bill passes.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; it is left in his hands, as far as national prohibition is concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the very provision of the bill on that point. This is simply an enforcement measure, pure and simple, an enforcement of the law as it now stands on the statute books. The bill reads:

> The term "war-prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

Title I of this act pertains to war-time prohibition. War-time prohibition will cease when there is a termination of demobilization and a declaration of peace.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator tell me, with war-time prohibition already on the statute books, what was his purpose in reengaging in the enterprise of passing another war-time prohibition act? If that is all he had in mind, and that is all this bill has in view, what was his purpose?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the best answer to the Senator from Alabama is the letter of the Attorney General himself, complaining of the fact that with no definition at all of intoxicating liquors in the war-prohibition act, and with no suitable means for the enforcement of that act, it was necessary to pass this law. He made a very strong appeal that Congress pass this war-prohibition act, or the part of the bill relating to war-time prohibition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator may think that is the purpose of this act, but I do not. In the first place, the Attorney General of the United States has several times recently announced to the people that he intended to enforce the war-time prohibition act; and, more than that, he is enforcing the war-time prohibition act without this law going on the statute books.

Of course, I realize that demobilization is here; but the end of war can not come until the Senate ratifies the treaty of peace; and I suppose that is far distant.

I merely make this statement, Mr. President, to make my position clear in reference to the matter. I think, although war is technically the status of the country, although war legislation is still on the statute books and enforceable, actually the war is over. The purpose of this legislation was to protect the soldier until he was demobilized, and the soldier is now demobilized. There are no great camps to be protected now; there is no great fighting force to be protected any more than in times of peace, and I think the good faith of the transaction should be carried out.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I will yield in a moment.

The good faith of the transaction should be carried out, and at least what is left of the year that these men were told that they could have, in which to wind up their business, be given to them.

The President is right. He is standing on sound ground. If the advocates of prohibition were right when they put in this bill a provision that it should not take effect until one year after its enactment, then the President of the United States is right in saying that the bill for the enforcement of constitutional prohibition shall not contain a clause in favor of war-time prohibition. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Of course, I realize what the Senate is going to do. The Senate of the United States is not going to defy the organized prohibition sentiment of the country. And I say "organized" because I think, so far as the rank and file of the people of the United States who believe in prohibition are concerned, they are honest men and believe in what is right and just, and I do not believe the rank and file would object to carrying out the prohibition amendment in good faith. But organized prohibition sentiment will not consent, and I know what the Senate is going to do when it comes to a vote. It is going to override the President's veto, of course, and pass the bill and take chances on the Supreme Court holding the law unconstitutional, whereas they could eliminate this feature, pass constitutional prohibition in three days without objection from anybody, and be positive that the bill was constitutional.

Mr. President, I did not get up here to discuss prohibition, but to say that I am opposed to putting anything in front of the treaty. Prohibition is a great question, a moral issue; but the issue of peace and war for the people of the United States overcaps all. The reason why there is riot and bloodshed in Europe, why people are starving, why government is disorganized, is because there is no peace. The reason why a soviet government is threatened in the United States and the American people stand in danger of labor riots that will stop industry and freeze the people of the North to death within the weeks to come is because there is no peace in the land.

The veto message of the President can be passed on next week or it can be settled next month without harm to anyone. The question of the treaty of peace has been debated before the Senate of the United States since last January, long before it ever came to this Chamber. It has been in almost continuous debate ever since. Senators may refer to how long some other treaty was before the Senate; yes, how long some other treaty was before the Senate in secret session, consuming an hour or two a day, and the affairs and business of the country running on; but, when you come to the hours that have been consumed, this treaty has long since passed the day of reasonable consideration and is not only trenching on the time of the Senate and stopping very vital legislation but is trenching on the patience of the American people.

There is no justification, to my mind, for one more hour of delay in this matter. Last night many of us were prepared to vote. A quorum of the Senate was present, the clock had not reached the hour of 6, but the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee recessed the Senate instead of allowing us to cast a vote and make one small step more toward the final conclusion of the consideration of the treaty.

I do not criticize men who differ with me on principle. A Senator in this Chamber who believes the treaty should be rejected is just as much entitled to his views as I am, who believe the treaty should be ratified without amendment. I have no criticism whatever for the Senator who differs with me on principle, but I think I am justified in criticizing the Senate for this inordinate and unnecessary delay.

There is no occasion whatever to vote in a day or in an hour on this prohibition bill. I suppose every man in the Senate knows now that the President's veto is going to be overridden. Every man in the Senate knows that if the veto were not overridden the Senate and the House would promptly pass a law enacting constitutional prohibition and a law that would enforce national constitutional prohibition. So there is no issue of that kind at stake. Of course when nation-wide prohibition and the issue of the President's veto on a question of this kind comes before the Senate it provokes discussion, and discussion brings delay. This matter can be disposed of just as well when the treaty of peace is disposed of as it can now; and I stand here not to resist the prompt disposition of the prohibition bill when the time comes, not to resist any law that will enforce constitutional prohibition, but I think the people of the country should realize who is causing the delay in the ratification of the peace treaty and why we can not get action. If we are going to reject the treaty of peace, we had better reject it to-morrow than next week. If we are going to ratify it, we had better ratify it to-morrow than next month. This debate does not produce anything. It does not change a vote. There is not a Senator who sits on this floor who can not take any pending amendment and a roll call, and call out now how each vote is going to be cast that will take effect a week from now, and he will not miss more than one or two votes.

Mr. BORAH. And those one or two votes might settle the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so; but if it did, why not have them and let it be settled? Yesterday Senators who are in favor of action, and at the same time favor the ratification of the treaty of peace without amendment, promptly voted when they were largely at a disadvantage by reason of the absence of some Senators. I tell you those who are standing for delay because they want to take advantage of some opportunity to carry out their will in the matter, whether they have a regularly recorded majority in the Senate or not, will never justify themselves before the American people.

What the Senate of the United States ought to do, if it proposes to sustain its place as a great legislative body, is to agree on a time for voting, fix a definite day, as we do on other matters, when these amendments shall be voted on. Give everybody notice; do not try to accomplish a result by sleight-of-hand tricks; but if you have the strength, win on your strength, and if you have not the strength to win, take your defeat like men. That is the only position to take before the country. If the Senate would fix a date within a reasonable time to vote, after the unending debate that we have already had, and let us vote this matter out, no matter where it falls, but let the Senate express its honest convictions on the question, it would not be necessary for the Senator from South Dakota to try to inject his motion ahead of the determination of the great treaty of peace.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to call attention of the Senator from Alabama to the interesting fact that the Senate can not act, because the Senate does not control its own affairs under its own rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. I agree with the Senator. At the last session of the Senate I proposed, and attempted to have passed, a rule that would have produced the closing of debate—a cloture rule in the Senate. Unfortunately, a majority of the Senate would not stand for cloture; but I am satisfied that the day is not far distant when the Senate must make rules to govern this body where we shall have orderly procedure, and an honest cloture rule, where a majority of the Senate can control the business of the country, or the people of the United States will show their contempt and condemnation of a body that can not control and transact its own business.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not expect to discuss this matter at all, and I shall be very brief now in the statement I make.

But first I am much surprised at the position taken by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], especially in what he says relative to the motives of those who desire, at the present time, action on this bill. With the very prompt and decisive and significant proceedings on the part of the House last evening, within so short a time after the receipt of the President's veto message, I do not see how the Senator from Alabama can complain because action is now sought upon the bill by the Senate.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama can not charge the Senator who, perhaps unfortunately, happens to be in charge of the bill at the present time, with any intention whatever of delaying proceedings or debate upon the peace treaty. He can not infer that from any remarks I have made, from any motion I have made, or from any proceedings in which I have participated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from South Dakota is making a case and putting himself up to shoot at himself. I never said anything about the Senator from South Dakota. I spoke about the procedure in this Chamber, not entirely on one side or on the other, but in this Chamber, to delay action on the treaty; and it is here, and the Senator from South Dakota can not deny it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, coming over from the House as this bill did this morning, with a message from the House, it was but the natural thing, it was the thing to be expected, that it should be presented promptly here before the Senate as in legislative session, and thus acting, I have submitted the motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think it would have been at least an act of courtesy, and would have been in accordance with the proprieties and customs of legislative bodies, when a veto message came from the President on a measure of this magnitude, to have the bill referred back to the committee for consideration of the veto message and the reasons assigned by the Executive for the veto of the bill?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not think such a procedure would be in accordance with any custom ever recognized or established in the Senate at all. I think the procedure is to take action upon the bill as it is reported to the Senate from the House, the bill having originated in the House and the House having passed the bill over the President's veto.

Mr. President, to refer briefly to the merits of the question as discussed by the Senator from Alabama, the war-time prohibition act was passed November 21, 1918, and it received the approval of the President of the United States 10 days after the armistice was signed. It is true that the President subsequently recommended the repeal of the law, some two or three months ago, if I remember correctly. The Congress did not see fit to act upon the President's recommendation, and the silence of Congress and the failure of Congress to respond to the recommendation of the President, I am satisfied, met with the approval of the people of the United States, and no act or failure to act on the part of the Senate or the Congress of the United States has met with greater approval than the refusal to comply with the request of the President of the United States to repeal the war prohibition act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to remind the Senator that each branch of Congress has voted definitely on a proposition to repeal that law and voted the proposition down by a large majority.

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I am glad the Senator calls my attention to that fact. I had for the moment overlooked it.

What is the situation, Mr. President? There is the law. It does not contain provisions for its proper enforcement, and title 1 of the prohibition act is for the simple purpose of giving to the law provisions for its effective enforcement. I call attention to the letter of the Attorney General of the United States in regard to this. He says, referring to the pending bill:

> I do not think the wisdom of such action on the part of Congress admits of doubt. It goes without saying, I think, that if a law merely prohibits intoxicating liquors and leaves to the jury in each case, from the evidence produced, to determine whether the liquor in question is, in fact, intoxicating or not, its efficient and uniform administration will be impossible.
>
> But in the absence of a definition by Congress there will be innumerable beverages as to which the claim will be made that they do not contain enough alcohol to render them intoxicating. These contentions will produce endless confusion and uncertainty.
> These, I think, are substantially the reasons why Congress should itself provide a definition.

Title I of the prohibition law gives that definition, and it also provides some additional remedies for the enforcement of the law as it has stood since November 21, 1918.

Mr. President, there is an urgent reason for prompt action on this bill as disclosed in the opinion of the Attorney General and as disclosed by what we read concerning the difficulty in conducting prosecutions for violation of the law. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I shall address the Senate briefly. I desire to resent the charge on the part of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that faith has been broken in the matter of the constitutional prohibition amendment. The one-year clause was connected with that amendment as a matter of grace and not of obligation in any sense, and I defy anyone to demonstrate that the inclusion of the one-year clause morally precluded Congress from enacting an emergency prohibition measure to meet a very evident crisis, a crisis partly illustrated by the disturbances growing out of the unrest incident to the closing days of the war.

The Senator from Alabama speaks of abstract justice. When did the saloon ever do justice to anybody, abstract or otherwise? Property rights! The Supreme Court has held on a number of occasions that there is no such thing as a property right in intoxicating liquor.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the sustaining of the President's veto would not accomplish anything; it would not even enable the Senator from Alabama to help the prohibitionists keep what he calls good faith in this matter. It could not repeal the war-time prohibition act. The war-time prohibition act remains in full force and operation. The only question before us is the question of its effective enforcement. The mock heroics of the Senator from Alabama are impressive from the dramatic standpoint only. There was never a time when prohibition was more imperatively needed than in this hour of general unrest and economic confusion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Does he understand that the war-time prohibition act ends when the President issues his proclamation to the effect that demobilization has taken place?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not, unless he proclaims demobilization after the ratification of the peace treaty.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from South Dakota I understood to take the position that when the President issued a proclamation to the effect that demobilization had taken place and peace was restored the war-time prohibition would end.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not so understand, unless, of course, the peace treaty had been actually ratified.

Mr. STERLING. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Idaho misunderstood me. I do not understand that the completion of demobilization would repeal the law, for it is to remain in effect until the end of the war.

Let me call the attention of the Senator to the statute:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization—

"Thereafter until the termination of demobilization."

Mr. BORAH. The President has the power, then, to suspend the operation of the law by a proclamation?

Mr. STERLING. No; I think not.

Mr. BORAH. Then we are up against a proposition——

Mr. STERLING. There must be the conclusion of the war; and that, of course, is evidenced, I presume, by a proclamation.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the Senator from South Dakota read further from the paragraph of the law from which he has quoted. I think it will show that demobilization must be followed by a proclamation of the President.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. It reads:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States——

Mr. BORAH. Is that a complete sentence?

Mr. STERLING. It is not a complete sentence; it goes on:

no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am unable to appreciate the existence of any emergency justifying our temporary abandonment of the consideration of the pending treaty for the purpose of overriding the President's veto of the prohibition bill. The situation does not affect the operation of existing law upon the subject. The war-time prohibition law is in full force and effect, subject, of course, to occasional violations, some committed with impunity. I fully agree with the Senator from Alabama that this treaty should be disposed of; we should either ratify it or reject it.

It may be that, with the exception of one or two phases of the treaty, something new can be said upon it, but I have listened to the greater number of discussions presented upon the floor both in favor of and in opposition to it, and I long ago came to the conclusion that argument and ingenuity had exhausted themselves, since which time we have been occupied in their reconsideration and repetition.

I do not think the present unrest is even in part due to the pendency of the treaty before this body. I am unable to accept the view that the failure to ratify or reject the document has produced or aggravated these unfortunate conditions or that final action will operate to assuage them, for their causes and the far-reaching character of the elements underlying these unfortunate conditions are too deep-seated. They have been too long gathering force and volume to rest upon legislative action or the lack of it. I do believe, however, that the ultimate disposition of the treaty will enable us and enable the world—because our ills are not peculiar to the United States—to readjust conditions and sooner recover from the shell shock of the war. Hence I am unwilling, except in matters of great emergency—and there are several of them—to suspend the consideration of the treaty until we have done with it.

The treaty was submitted to the consideration of the Senate by the President on the 10th day of July. For something like two months it was in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That, however, did not suspend its consideration here, for over two-thirds of our time was occupied in its discussion during that period. Since the committee reported it has reconvened on many occasions and has considered other amendments and other reservations, some of which it has added to its original report; others, I suppose, have been rejected; and the end is not yet. We have had two or three record votes upon two or three amendments only, and all the reservations are still before us, to say nothing of a number of independent amendments, notice of which has been given, and which we may expect to encounter.

If we compare that which we have accomplished so far with what we evidently have to do in the future regarding it, and make calculation of the time that is past with the time that may hereafter be consumed in its consideration, making no greater progress, we may possibly reach a final vote on the treaty by the 1st day of April next. I do not for a moment assume that such will be the case, but I am convinced that if we set aside the treaty every time some matter of apparent immediate concern presents itself for consideration, the time yet to be consumed in its consideration will carry us into the holidays without final action.

I am prepared to vote to-morrow—to-day, if necessary—both as to all amendments, all reservations, and the final vote upon the treaty.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. FALL. Would the Senator make a motion to that effect, or make a proposal for unanimous consent to vote on a certain day fixed, at a certain hour?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, if I were in charge of the treaty, yes; but I am not. Moreover, the Senator knows that I am not in full sympathy with those supporting the treaty. I should be very happy, however, to support such a motion if the Senator from Nebraska sees fit at any time to submit it to the consideration of the session.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I am in exactly the same position that he is, but that unless a motion or a proposition of this character is made at a very early moment, I shall test the temper of the Senate upon the subject myself.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator's last remark illustrates the old adage that great minds agree. We are together upon that subject. The sooner we can get action, the better it will suit me.

Now, a word as to the bill recently vetoed.

The Senator from Texas says that at the time of the adoption of the resolution which crystallized into a constitutional amendment there was no understanding, express or implied, that nothing should be done meanwhile affecting the liquor traffic; and I have no doubt the Senator has stated what is in his own mind, as well as that of multitudes of the people of the United States, including many Senators. At the same time, I am satisfied that others like myself assumed the existence or implication of such an understanding, because that method of legislation has characterized all constitutional amendments regarding prohibition in the various States, so far as I remember; and the purpose was obvious.

It may be true that the Supreme Court has determined that there is no property in intoxicants. It may also be true that saloonkeepers never kept faith with anyone. I am not here either to defend or to attack them. Moreover, that consideration is beside the question. Yet organized society in the United States has for years regarded the manufacture of intoxicants and their possession as legitimate, as property; and millions of dollars have been invested, on the strength of our laws, in the manufacture of liquor and the dispensation of intoxicating drinks. The moral sentiment of the world is against it, and ought to be; but I contend that the plainest principles of abstract justice protest against confiscation, regardless of the character of the property which is the subject of it. The idea is abhorrent to American law, and should be to American practice. The injustice of such a course lies at the basis of those State constitutional amendments, which were adopted, to operate in futuro, thus giving opportunity in the interval to those who had invested their money to make some disposition of their goods and save something from the wreckage of their fortunes.

I therefore considered that there was an implication of a suspension of all national interim legislation upon the subject, and for that reason, among others, I voted against the war-time prohibition bill. I also voted against it because, presented at a time when the Government needed money as it never did, the effect of the law was to deplete our estimated annual revenues by no less than $700,000,000 or $750,000,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I remind the Senator of the fact that the war-time prohibition act did not become effective for nine months after it became a law, and that at once afforded a great opportunity to these people to dispose of their holdings?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and that very fact demonstrated the lack of need for such legislation, because it could be justified as a war measure only because the need for it was insistent. Notwithstanding that fact, the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its war powers, enacted it as a war measure yet provided that it should not take effect for nine months thereafter.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Colorado is aware of the lapse of time; but I wonder if he would not be willing that we shall vote on this matter before 1 o'clock, since the Senate is to take a recess at that time?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, ordinarily I would do anything in the world to accommodate my well-beloved friend, the Senator from South Dakota, and I will get through just as soon as I can; but really I do not believe that this matter is so urgent as to require a vote before we receive his Majesty, the King of the Belgians and his good queen. Moreover, it might be a shock to the Senate so suddenly to pass upon and dispose of a debatable measure. That I wish to avoid.

It is quite true, as the Senator from Texas suggests, that the leeway of several months time, given by this exigent war measure, enabled those affected by the legislation to get rid of a great part of their stock; yet we know that the time was not sufficient for that purpose. Perhaps the time fixed by the amendment would not have been sufficient, but that carried its own requirements.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The right of export exists to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; the right of export exists to-day. We can not drink ourselves, but under this bill we are at perfect liberty to sell our liquor to the world. That is another peculiar thing about this law that I have never been able to justify, because if whisky is not good for me it is not good for my neighbor. If my moral, mental, and physical well-being require me to abstain from intoxicants, then the golden rule and my duty to my neighbor require that the privilege of selling to him what is poison to me, and putting his good money into my pocket while degrading and demoralizing him, should be denied me. The Senator is correct. We can still do that, and I think we are doing it. Indeed, I have been told that the entire wine product of California for the last year has been sold to Japan. Perhaps to that is due some of Japan's diplomacy recently, and about which we have heard some criticism upon this floor.

Mr. President, where is the necessity for immediate and arbitrary action upon the President's veto? Will more liquor be sold if the President's veto should not be acted upon for the next two weeks than will be sold otherwise? Is there any relaxation of the enforcement of the war-time prohibitory law? I can perceive how, in one sense, immediate action is necessary. For example, I am in receipt of a great many requests from mighty good Democrats in the State of Colorado, requesting employment by the Government as soon as possible for the enforcement of the prohibition law. They are all such good men that I am embarrassed in making a suggestion concerning them to the appointing power. My brethren on both sides of the Chamber doubtless share in that embarrassment in some degree, not excepting my genial friend the Senator from Texas. To them the postponement of final consideration will be a sad disappointment, and the labors of our stenographers will be enlarged and extended in consequence; but we are used to that. Some of us are so fond of it that we want to see the civil-service law modified, myself among the number.

I think, Mr. President, the Attorney General proposes to go right ahead; and the staff of assistants which he has in every State of the Union will not be discouraged nor their energy in any way affected by giving us an opportunity calmly, deliberately, dispassionately, and in the usual senatorial way, to investigate the merits of the President's veto message and to convince ourselves of its virtue, as so many friends of mine are convinced of the virtue of his appeals for the league of nations.

Frankly, Mr. President, I do not believe that it is fair—and I say this without intending any criticism of the House of Representatives—to act so precipitately upon an important state paper emanating from the President of the United States. I do not believe the President has vetoed this bill for any petulant reason, for any other than the desire to discharge the high duties of his office in full accordance with his understanding of what those duties are. I do not believe that he has interposed his veto without fullest consideration of the measure, and without its consideration as well by the law adviser of the Government. I read it twice, and I was pleased to note that in some respects it ran along the lines of my discussion of the measure at the time the prohibition law was before the Senate for consideration.

I have had some doubts about the constitutionality of the war prohibition law, some very serious doubts. The Constitution, Mr. President, is not the obstacle to legislation that it once was. Some of us are disposed not only toward its liberal construction, but toward a construction that can not be reconciled with its phrascology. But the courts proceed in far different lines.

I notice by the morning press that one of the Federal courts—the district court for the State of Kentucky—yesterday, or the day before, after full consideration, adjudged the law to be unconstitutional, and that the case will be expedited as speedily as possible, so that the Supreme Court of the United States may pass upon it without unnecessary delay. I should like to read that opinion, Mr. President, before casting my vote upon this veto. It may be convincing to me, perhaps more convincing to me than to the enthusiastic advocates of the bill just vetoed. But the fact is that for the first time, I think—I may be mistaken—the constitutionality of the act has been challenged and carried to the point of a judicial decision, and that decision has been adverse. Hence there can be such a thing as an unconstitutional legal enactment concerning prohibition.

I know, of course, as the Senator from Alabama well said, that when this veto message does come before the Senate it will be as speedily overthrown as it was in the House, and that in obedience to the organized prohibition sentiment of the United States. I am not complaining of it. It may be the best way to dispose of it. It certainly will have the merit of decision. But I do not believe that we should interrupt our consideration of the treaty unless and until something of vastly more immediate importance shall be brought to our attention.

A few mornings ago I introduced a resolution pledging the support of Congress to the executive authorities of the Nation and of the States in such measures as they might invoke or be required to take for the establishment and continuation of law and order and the protection of the rights of the individual, in view of the impending coal strike. I regard that, Mr. President, as a subject of transcendent importance. The prospect involved in that strike is appalling in many of its aspects, and particularly in the suffering and want that must come to the doors of many an American family throughout this country. I felt, Mr. President, and I still feel, that a unanimous expression from the Congress of the United States in support of the authorities of the country at this juncture would, in its moral effect, be of incalculable value at a time of crisis like this. I was unable to obtain unanimous consent for its consideration. I shall attempt it to-morrow morning; and I do not think there is a man or a woman within the sound of my voice who will not say that as between these two subjects, the one involved in my resolution and that we are now discussing——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that guests have been invited to the Senate Chamber, and I suggest that he yield that I may submit a motion for a recess, the Senator not losing his right to the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECEPTION TO THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

At 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. the Assistant Doorkeeper announced the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who were escorted to the seats provided for them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the Sergeant at Arms announced the committee of Senators escorting the King of the Belgians, the Crown Prince and the King's suite.

King Albert was seated on the right of the Vice President's chair and the Crown Prince to the right of the King, and the King's suite occupied the seats reserved for them.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE CUMMINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, in my time I have performed the service I am about to render for all sorts and conditions of men; for men of high and low degree; for men of fame and men obscure; for men who lead and men who follow; for men who command and men who obey; but never in all my life have I undertaken the task with keener pleasure or deeper appreciation than I experience at this moment.

Fortunately for civilization, strong characters have played their parts, and played them well, in every age. To be great, however, strength must be united with the opportunity to do some vital thing for humanity; and the strong character must be associated with some mighty event in the affairs of the world. Sometimes it has happened that when strength of character and opportunity combine, the man and the people he represents have risen to the full measure of the duty imposed, and then that man wins, for all the years to come, a leadership in human concerns from which nothing can dethrone him; and that people awaken and hold a gratitude which passes unimpaired to the remotest generations. It is because our noble and distinguished guest is one of those men and his people one of those nations that I count the privilege which has fallen upon the Senate as one of the highest honor and the most enduring memory. [Applause.]

We are living now in a world well-nigh wrecked by the wicked ambitions of one great power; and many hard and weary years must go by before either Europe or America will be peaceful, quiet, or content. If nothing had been destroyed save physical creations or commercial structures, the labor of restoration would involve the sustained energy of decades of limitless patience and self-denial; but our loss is infinitely greater than is felt in the destruction of these material things. The war has unsettled our accepted faith in the forms of organized society, in the relations which its members should bear to each other, and in the instrumentalities through which justice, happiness, and growth can best be attained. The war may be ended, so far as the armies of Germany are concerned, but the struggle with the forces loosened in the terrific conflict has just begun.

I have mentioned this phase of a world-wide subject, not to diminish the value and the glory of winning the war, but to fortify the resolution of the good citizens of every nation of the earth, urging them to grapple with these problems with the same intensity of purpose, the same calm courage, the same unselfish spirit with which Belgium met the advancing hosts of Germany as they marched toward the conquest of the world. [Applause.]

In this presence my mind is driven irresistibly to one question: No matter how difficult the work of reconstruction and readjustment may be, no matter how long successful accomplishment may require, what if Germany had won? What if she had been allowed to pass, unchecked, through Belgium to an unprepared France and on to Britain, unready for war? Chaotic as the situation everywhere is, we cherish the hope that under free institutions the salvation of mankind is as certain as the lapse of time. But what if Germany had crushed Europe with an iron hand, subordinated Asia to her will, and then turned her power toward America? I do not know, no mortal can know, whether her far-reaching designs could, under any circumstances, have been carried into execution; but this we do know, that one country, small in territory, weak—comparatively—in military strength, but incomparable in loyalty to a Christian civilization and human liberty, unsurpassed in bravery, inspired by the loftiest ideals, stood in the path of this oncoming monster and, in supreme sacrifice, saved the world for freedom. [Applause.] When the sons and daughters of our race, now or hereafter, forget this sacrifice or fail to remember it with reverence and gratitude, the world which Belgium saved will be unworthy of its deliverance. [Applause.]

Of all the heroic tales of the fourteenth century there is no one which so tugs at the heartstrings as the immolation of Arnold Winkelreid, the Swiss patriot, upon the Austrian spears. The poet has engraved it imperishably in the annals of patriotism:

"Make way for liberty!" he cried;
Made way for liberty, and died.

Individual sacrifice, happily, adorns every page of history, but it remains for the immortal Belgians and their beloved King to record an instance in which national altruism rose to the heights of personal devotion. [Applause.] When Belgium bared her bosom to the German arms, daring death itself that liberty might live, she earned the undying affection of the people of the United States; and it is the earnest prayer of every American heart that during all the years to come our country will lose no opportunity to prove her everlasting gratitude.

Of all the men of Europe, Asia, Africa, or the islands of the seas there lives no man more heartily welcome to the Senate of the United States than the man who sits at my side. [Applause.]

Senators, I present to you our friend, our defender, and our ally, Albert, King of the Belgians. [Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS BY HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

KING ALBERT. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, it is indeed a great honor for me to address this illustrious assembly.

I salute not only the eminent men who receive me here to-day, but I salute the memory of your great predecessors who, during 130 years, have sat in this place and given to the whole world the example of the highest civic virtues.

From the bottom of my heart I thank your President for the beautiful and far too laudatory words that he has addressed to me. It has been a great pleasure for us to be in America, and our one regret is, and it is a deep regret, that your illustrious President is ill. We express the earnest wish that he may soon be restored to full health and vigor.

This welcome of the Senate seals that reception, so warm and so spontaneous, which I have received everywhere during my journey across this magnificent country.

I am deeply moved by the expressions of sympathy that the name of Belgium evokes from this noble American people.

Nothing could better characterize the reign of universal democracy than that friendship which unites the great Republic, with its 110,000,000 citizens, and the realm of which I am the constitutional head, with its seven million and a half inhabitants.

If there is not equality of power and riches between them, there is equality in the love of liberty and in aspiration toward social progress. [Applause.]

On both sides of the Atlantic the same ideal inspires us. The exchange of ideas, the commercial relations, the visits to Belgium of eminent American citizens, of whom many sit in this assembly, are so many means of tightening the bonds between the two nations.

I hope with all my heart that these relations, which go back as far as memory, which have been fortified during the war as well as by the admirable assistance which you rendered Belgium by feeding her people and by the fraternity in arms, will never cease to develop for the great good of our two peoples. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The King will be glad to meet the Senators personally. The Chair asks that at the conclusion of this short ceremony Senators will resume their places until His Majesty and his suite and the invited guests shall leave the Chamber. The Chair asks the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to present the Members of the Senate to His Majesty.

His Majesty Albert, King of the Belgians, and the Crown Prince took their places at the left of the Vice President's desk, and the Members of the Senate were presented to them by Mr. LODGE.

On the conclusion of the ceremonies, the King and his suite were escorted from the Chamber, and the invited guests of the Senate withdrew.

The Senate reassembled at 2 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McCormick	Simmons
Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harris	McLean	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Harrison	McNary	Smoot

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of opposing the motion made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to return to legislative session, and desire briefly to state some of the reasons which impel me to pursue that course.

The avowed purpose of the Senator from South Dakota in making the motion is that the Senate may proceed to consideration of the veto message sent to the House of Representatives yesterday by the President respecting the so-called war-time prohibition bill. If the motion prevails, it means that the treaty of peace will be displaced and discussion of the subject of prohibition will be begun. I believe that the country regards the final disposition of the treaty of peace as the most important action which the Senate can take, and I believe that the people of the United States feel that the Senate should proceed as rapidly as practicable to a conclusion concerning the matter, without regard to whether they favor the treaty or favor its rejection. Let us inquire whether substituting in the Senate a discussion on prohibition for a discussion of the treaty of peace will accomplish any substantial benefit to the country.

Constitutional prohibition, prohibition which everyone admits will be legal, will go into effect January 1 next. If we proceed, as has been suggested by the Senator from South Dakota, to displace the treaty of peace with the veto message, those who are opposed to a prompt determination of the treaty and questions relating to it will find the subject of prohibition an easy means of prolonging discussion and of deferring final action on the treaty.

I do not know, nor do I think any Senator can tell, how long a discussion of this very interesting subject of prohibition will last, in view of the profound interest in that subject of a number of Senators, including perhaps my friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. If an agreement to vote could now be made and the early disposition of the veto message assured, I would not oppose this motion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator says he can not tell how long this discussion will last. May I ask the Senator if he participated in the discussion when the bill was before the Senate? There was ample opportunity for a full discussion of the prohibition bill when it was before the Senate. Why should much time be taken now in discussing the merits of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, the Senator will please pardon me from any attempt to explain why Senators may consume a great deal of time in discussing any subject. Nobody but the Almighty could answer that question. Mr. President, day after day we have listened to able Senators repeat over and over arguments that the country is entirely familiar with concerning certain features of the treaty, and I repeat that a Senator who does not want final disposition of the treaty made at an early date may find the all-interesting topic of prohibition an easy means of prolonging the discussion indefinitely.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have pleasure in yielding to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that if the motion of the Senator from South Dakota is adopted and we go into legislative session for the purpose of discussing the so-called prohibition bill, and there is protracted debate, a motion could be made at any time to go into executive session, and that motion is not subject to debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but I am not in favor of superseding the treaty with a discussion on the subject of prohibition, for, as I was just about to point out, after all, even from the standpoint of those of us who consider ourselves strong prohibitionists, it is not a very important matter to the country. We have in a perfectly legal way provided that prohibition shall go into effect on the 1st of January. We all concede that there is a very grave question as to whether or not, under the existing circumstances, a court will sustain the proposed war-time prohibition act. It has, indeed, been held unconstitutional already by one court. The point I am making—and I shall be very brief in my discussion—the point I am attempting to make is that the Senate ought not to set aside a subject that is of vital interest to the people of the United States and to the people of the earth, a question which ought to be determined one way or the other promptly, whether we shall ratify or reject the pending treaty of peace, and enter into a more or less academic discussion of the subject of prohibition.

Mr. President, the present session of Congress is rapidly drawing to a close. I do not charge any Senator with an intention to filibuster or to prevent a final vote on the treaty of peace during the present session, but I think I am justified, in view of the history of the proceedings in the Senate during the last six months in saying that those who want the treaty acted upon ought not to put it at the mercy of its enemies.

"WHO WON THE WAR?"

Notwithstanding a year has passed since the armistice was signed, in my opinion there is little prospect of formal peace in the immediate or early future.

The war is not over by any means. General and apparently uncontrollable profiteering, widespread discontent, and the threatened closing down of the Nation's industries through general strikes occasion more danger to the country and forecast more suffering and death than resulted from actual hostilities.

In view of the conditions existing among the allied and associated powers, particularly in the United States and Great Britain, the question "Who won the war?" assumes startling significance.

Since the armistice was signed we have been boasting of the victory which we thought the Allies had won, but the valor and success of American, British, French, and Italian troops in the field, in part at least, has been offset by rivalries, jealousies, and divisions in council which may convert military victory into actual defeat.

In view of the comparative conditions in the United States and in Germany we are justified in asking, "Will the net result prove a triumph for the Central Powers?"

Present and prospective conditions make the immediate future for the United States a more critical time than the period of actual fighting. While the Senate wrangles over details concerning the league of nations, while Senators repeat over and over arguments with which the country has become familiar, while we indulge in what we ought to know are vain attempts to change the views of our colleagues, the spirit of unrest and of revolution grows throughout the Nation.

The United States presented the sublimest spectacle in history during the progress of the war. With unparalleled rapidity she organized, trained, and dispatched to the front, in spite of seemingly insuperable difficulties and obstacles, overwhelming military forces, which made the triumph of German arms impossible and which insured speedy victory to the allied cause.

What a striking contrast this country presents in its efforts to return to peace as compared with its attitude exhibited before the armistice!

Make no mistake about it, a nation-wide industrial war threatens the United States. Indeed, the conflict is already in progress. Almost every industry upon which the economic life of America depends is threatened with a general strike. The daily press is filled with accounts of demands and counter demands, with reports of conferences that fail to prove conciliatory. The steel strike, the impending coal strike, the threatened railroad strike are but three of the most important among hundreds of simultaneous evidences of industrial revolution. Gen. Harries, assistant chief of staff to Gen. Pershing, declares that existing disturbances in America are due to the continued circulation of German propaganda.

In a recent interview, which I shall publish in full in connection with my remarks, he said:

> German propaganda to-day is as deadly and as freely circulated as at any time before or during the war. It still aims to wreck the foundation of our Government. Its purpose is to erase all laws and order from the face of the country. England already has felt its effects.

I do not myself make that statement. I quote it from a great military authority, who professes to be familiar with conditions as they actually exist. Whether this declaration be correct, we are still nominally at war, while our principal allies have made peace with the Central Empires.

If the industrial warfare now in progress is indefinitely continued Germany will not find it necessary to resume military activities in order to retaliate against this Government for the part we took in the war against her. She will not need to attack us from the outside, for she can undoubtedly accomplish more harm to our people and their institutions by fomenting internal disorders. Control of labor organizations has passed, or is passing, to radicals. Former conservative leaders seem to be joining in the hue and cry in order to retain some semblance of their former power or to restore themselves to favor. Profiteers complacently continue the exploitation of the public, while labor threatens to paralyze economic conditions.

Meantime what are the conditions in Germany? If press reports are to be believed she is taking advantage of the chaos prevailing the allied countries. Her industries are successfully operated and are growing stronger every day. Her workingmen are voluntarily performing two hours per day more work than is required, while American coal miners are insisting upon a five-day week and a six-hour day. In spite of the high prices charged for food products in Germany, her people are settling down to the practice of thrift, economy, and good faith in their labors. Many of the leading publicists of France and England declare that within 10 years or less she will be relatively where she was before the war.

In denouncing as unlawful and dangerous to the Nation the threatened coal strike, ordered by the leaders of the miners' union without a vote of the miners themselves and in disregard of the safety of the country, and in declaring the public interest paramount in this controversy the President has earned, and I believe will receive, the support of Congress.

Neither profiteers nor hysterical agitators can overthrow this Government. It is impossible for any influences or all Government agencies combined to immediately restore conditions to normal, and our people must recognize this fact and exercise patience. In the meantime let us do our duty. Let us treat bona fide labor disputes in a spirit of fairness and liberality toward labor.

Solutions for labor controversies that do not have their origin in a spirit of disloyalty should be worked out with a generous regard for the rights and interests of the laborer; those which originate in animosity toward our free institutions, controversies which gather their support from enemy influences and which are advanced in the name of revolution, must be fearlessly encountered and combated. This Government, despite its mistakes and in spite of the weaknesses at times displayed by its officers, is greater and more enduring than any external force which can assail it, greater than any internal treason which would seek to undermine it.

While the world waits on the action of the Senate to determine whether or not we shall have peace, while the industries of the United States suffer under the abnormal conditions that exist because of the technical continuance of war, we are now asked to put aside the treaty of peace in order that Senators may have an opportunity of expressing their sentiments on the subject of prohibition.

I think that it is far more important that the Senate should go forward in the discharge of its duty in determining whether we shall ratify or reject the treaty of peace than to engage in any attempt to discuss in an academic way the subject of prohibition.

I do not want further to delay the disposition of this question, and, in so far as I am concerned, I have said all that I desire to say upon the subject. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some interviews, a telegram or two, and two letters which I have recently received relating to profiteering and to industrial conditions, presenting interesting viewpoints.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MORE HUN PROPAGANDA—IS CAUSE OF MUCH LABOR UNREST, SAYS GEN. HARRIES.

CHICAGO, October 22.

Speaking before a gathering of members of the Electric Club at the Elks' Club rooms to-day, Maj. Gen. George H. Harries, assistant chief of staff to Gen. Pershing, indirectly attributed the present labor unrest and other disturbances in America to the continued circulation of German propaganda. He said:

"German propaganda to-day is as deadly and as freely circulated as at any time before or during the war. It still aims to wreck the foundation of our Government. Its purpose is to erase all law and order from the face of the country. England already has felt its effects."

Gen. Harries was the first American officer into Berlin and watched the return of the German troops. He said they were hailed as "conquering heroes."

PUBLIC IS WEARY OF BEING DAMNED—MUST BE CONSIDERED IN INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES, SAYS KANSAS GOVERNOR.

CHICAGO, October 23.

Controversies between capital and labor will not be settled in the future without consulting the interests of the factor most vitally affected by their agreements—the public—says Gov. Henry J. Allen, of Kansas.

"Employers and employees have got to take a third party, a party bigger than both of them combined, into consideration," said the governor, who arrived in Chicago to-day. "That party is the public.

"The public is not going to act the part of the innocent bystander any more without protest. And the public is beginning to wake up and realize that. That's true, anyway, in the part of the Middle West that I come from. The people are beginning to realize not only their rights but also their responsibilities, and any faction in the industrial and labor conference in Washington whose actions merit the condemnation of the public is going to be sorry for it. There isn't a phrase in our language so out of date as 'the public be d—d.'"

Gov. Allen came to Chicago at the invitation of Julius Rosenwald to deliver an address at the Blackstone to-night in behalf of the Jewish war relief fund.

PINE BLUFF, ARK., October 24, 1919.

Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Large industries and consumers very much disturbed over demands of coal miners. Gas company already announced increase of 25 per cent to industries, which means they will in turn add to their commodities which consumers must purchase, and on whom this burden will finally fall. They can not stand additional burden on already high cost of living. Railroads make showing that means they must have 10 per cent increase in rates to meet increase in price of coal and reduction of hours, which also is dangerous precedent. Our organization hopes you will favor any legislation possible to avoid conceding present demand of miners. We have reached stage where this labor profiteering must cease.

FORT SMITH, ARK., October 23, 1919.

Senator ROBINSON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As a private citizen and a union man, I feel the necessity of writing to you again.

Things look dark, indeed, for our country; and labor, it seems to me, not only is bringing about this state of chaos but stands in a fair way of losing rights that are really hers.

I hope you will see, however, that the rank and file of labor are easily satisfied and will follow the side having the most power and the fairest proposition. Our Government is not really in a struggle with the laboring man but with his unprincipled leaders, who are bent on destruction if they can not have their way.

I trust, also, that you will come to understand that autocracy in our industries must be destroyed, and that regardless of whether it is practiced by capital or by labor; for, as a matter of fact, no man has the right to rule over his fellow men except by delegated authority; and this is true industrially as well as politically. Neither money nor "divine right" nor prowess can give such right.

Since there are but two divisions of government, autocratic and democratic, and we have long since renounced political autocracy, it remains for us to renounce industrial autocracy—labor as well as capital.

Unless our Senators and Representatives in Washington formulate some sort of concrete plan to place before the American people, you may find a proposition "well-nigh" too big to handle, should the miners and the railroad workers decide to strike at the same time—or at different times, for that matter.

Now, I conceive all production to be carried on by labor and capital working cooperatively under industrial democracy. Capital is money used in production. All that is due it is a return of a certain portion of the profit from the things produced. The possession of capital gives its owners absolutely no right to control in any way the lives or actions of the workers in production.

I understand the term worker to mean managers and classified employees.

The managing department have a general supervision over the running of the industry, while the classified employees attend directly to production.

No manager, superintendent, or boss should do anything directly affecting the workers without the latter's consent. The classified employees should democratically determine their own working conditions and share with capital in the profits. Hence the shorter the hours of labor, the fewer the days, the less would be the profits. While if two men performed work that one could do, two men instead of one would share in the profits.

This will give labor the proper responsibility.

Now, if workers in each plant made their own rules of work, or rather fixed their own working conditions, democratically and in cooperation with the managers of industry and received a certain portion of the profits, the size of which would be determined by the market value of their product, their own working conditions and their efficiency in production, where would be the need of "one big union," or trades-unions, or collective bargaining?

I am not trying to suggest to you, but my opinion is that Congress herself must "invent" a fair industrial system wherein autocracy by both capital and labor are tabooed, the worker can vote peaceably for what he wishes, but bearing the responsibility himself, and strikes and lockouts are penalized. For autocratic capital means inhuman hours of toil, insanitary working conditions, and ultimately the enslavement of the worker—all to squeeze out profits, which capital gets. While autocratic labor means too few hours of toil, too few days per week of toil, a frightful reduction in production, causing excessively high wages and living expenses, and ultimately the overthrow of free government. We can not, we must not, tolerate either.

I hope to see a letter from you saying our Congressmen are facing the present crisis bravely, and that they are determined to destroy every agency that menaces free government; also that a system of cooperation between labor and capital will be worked out and the "divine" belligerency of these two very necessary elements in production will be forceably, if not otherwise, wiped off the slate.

Kindly pardon this long letter, but be sure to count me as one standing firmly behind the Government.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. E. STAMPS.

FORT SMITH, ARK., October 22, 1919.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am attaching an editorial cut out of one of our local papers, which covers my sentiments and feelings very nicely. I am not trying to criticize anyone but I am trying to tell you gentlemen of the Congress that if some relief is not afforded soon to the public from the present conditions, which are fast becoming intolerable, all of us, or rather none of us, will have anything left to fuss over. I have been a lifelong Democrat and have never been radical. My territory now is composed of the western part of Arkansas, and never in 15 years of experience as a commercial traveler have I heard such bitter complaints against conditions as to-day by all classes of citizens—business men, farmers, professional, and all classes—and don't know of any better way to express the situation than by saying it is like one sitting on a keg of powder with the fuse burning.

This is the first letter of this nature I have ever written; hope it may be the last. I have always regarded you as a strong man, honest and straightforward and willing at all times to fight for your convictions. This letter would not be complete if I did not say in what regard I held you, and as I am not in politics, never held an office and do not want to, you can best judge what such sentiments may amount to; but for God's sake try and get some of your brother Senators to forget the peace treaty or ratify it and get down to business. Too much politics by "Mr. LODGE & Co." When it is all over fear we won't have any country to bawl about—all gone Red.

Yours, truly,

FRANK CARRICK.

ITS UP TO YOU.

There are three things that Congress can do at once to safeguard the households of America; to curb the crooks that are plotting against every American pocketbook.

First. The Lever food bill, with a prison penalty for food gamblers, should be extended to operate after peace is signed.

Second. The power of the Sugar Equalization Board should be extended after January 1, 1920.

Third. The scheme to boost the price of coffee, in which the Brazilian Government is the accomplice of food speculators, should be rigorously investigated.

Not one argument has been offered against any of these measures. The Department of Justice promises to cut prices down to normal by jailing profiteers. It pleads with Congress to give it a fair opportunity.

President Wilson asked for legislation against profiteering 10 weeks ago.

One reason that Congress stalls and delays is that the public is doing nothing.

Of course, everyone complains and protests and wonders why, but a 2-cent stamp, an envelope, and a sheet of paper will carry your wishes straight to the men who have the power to help you.

Food speculators, with millions at stake, are not idle—not for a minute.

You, with your earnings and savings at stake—why don't you do something?

Just write, "Dear Senator," or "Dear Congressman. Don't forget us. Guard us against the profiteer by pushing the measures needed to fight the high cost of living. Give us as much protection in peace time as we had in war time."

The appeals of national leaders, of the press, of economists, mean nothing unless you back them up!

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me that I may present a conference report?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes. I ask for the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I shall not object if the motion leads to no debate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before consenting, so far as I am concerned, I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming explain what, if any, differences there are between the bill as it passed the Senate and as the conferees now report it.

Mr. WARREN. The reading of the report will develop the differences, and I, of course, will answer any questions after the reading is concluded.

Mr. KING. The Senator is going to ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the reading of the report.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota objects, and the report upon objection goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire whether or not the conference report submitted by the Senator from Wyoming would not be privileged and would not have the right of way over the matter which is now receiving consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is privileged in so far as its presentation is concerned; it is not privileged so far as its consideration is concerned. It has been presented, and, upon objection, goes over until the following day.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Wyoming that I objected because it seems apparent now that there will be discussion if the report is taken up at this time, and there is a pending motion to return to legislative session for the purpose of disposing of the prohibition bill.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will withhold his objection until I can explain why I wish to call up the conference report at this time. The chairman of the committee on the House side has appointments which will take him out of town, and it is consequently desirable to have prompt action on the report. I hope some time to-day that the report may be taken up and disposed of. Of course it may go over at present under objection; but I shall try to have it taken up at some time this afternoon and secure its consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to take up the conference report will not the Senate have to go into legislative session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the report must be considered in legislative session.

Mr. NORRIS. I object to considering the report except in legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the question now before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from South Dakota to return to legislative session.

Mr. NORRIS. If that motion is carried, the request of the Senator from Wyoming would be in order.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Lodge	Simmons
Bankhead	Hale	McCormick	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Harris	McLean	Smith, Md.

Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	Knox	Robinson	Warren
Gerry	La Follette	Sheppard	Watson
Gore	Lenroot	Shields	Wolcott

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if this matter is brought to a vote to-day, I shall vote against taking up the war-time prohibition veto. I do so for two reasons. In the first place, owing to the fact that I was occupied with other matters most of the time during the consideration of this bill, I knew little of its contents when it passed the Senate, and I do not know any more yet of its contents; but before I vote to override the veto I want to know concerning one particular proposition, and that is whether or not, in my judgment, the war-time prohibition act is a constitutional act.

The President has stated here in one paragraph a principle with which I am in full accord. He says:

> I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress.

We passed during the war a great many acts which should have been considered as having served their purpose as soon as the war was over, whether technically the war has been ended or not. There are a number of acts, such as the espionage act and other acts, which I think ought to have been considered as at an end; and I do not want to vote here against a principle which I have maintained with some degree of earnestness ever since the war closed until I know whether or not there is any distinction between the act to which the President refers and the other act which I have been somewhat considering. So until I at least have another day to look into this matter I shall vote against its consideration.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I have no desire to displace the consideration of the treaty. I am perfectly willing, when the debate is over, that the treaty shall be voted upon. I am in no particular haste about concluding the debate, but I am willing to debate that particular subject, because I do not agree with my friends who say that nothing is gained by debate at this time. It is possible that nothing is gained in the Senate by debate; but there is a larger and wider forum in which some of us are interested, because there are a few of us who do not propose to quit this fight when this treaty is voted on. It will continue until the last vestige of the scheme to involve this country in European wars is wiped out, if it is possible to do it, and from this forum we can best advise the people of the United States of its contents. Therefore I am perfectly willing to go ahead with the debate every hour until finally we shall have reached a vote by having exhausted the subject, if that can ever be.

So I have no desire to displace the treaty at all. I am perfectly willing to proceed with it; but the other reason why I vote against it at this time is the reason which I have just stated—because I have not sufficient information to vote intelligently upon the question of overriding the President's veto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this veto and the subject of it will have to be disposed of, and disposed of at once. It seems to me that the quickest way of doing it, now that we have been debating it for a couple of hours, is to vote on it now and get rid of it. The day is broken up. I think if we put it over it will only cause additional delay. It seems to me the best way of expediting the treaty is to take up this veto message and dispose of it. I think it can be disposed of in a very short time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will state the inquiry.

Mr. KING. An affirmative vote upon the matter just submitted by the Chair would not preclude a discussion of the question upon its merits, would it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from South Dakota is that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business. If the motion prevails, any subject can be considered by the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I wish to say briefly that the President in his message to Congress recommended the repeal of the war-time prohibition act. He now states that the conditions which justified Congress in passing the measure have ceased to exist. I simply desire to remind the Senate in a spirit of fair play that the constitutional amendment forbidding the manufacture and use of wines and liquors provided that a year's time should elapse before it became effective, and I should say that the Senate has acted in bad faith, and the House as well, in cutting that time by statutory enactment, and that is the effect of the war-time prohibition act.

If there is any means by which we can give a short time of grace to those who are interested in this industry, it would be in the spirit of justice to them to do so. Hence I shall oppose any motion which will facilitate the overriding of the President's veto not because in my judgment it will affect the result at all, but because, as a matter of principle, I think Congress should respect the constitutional amendment, which gives a period of grace to those who are legitimately engaged in an industry which at one time the Congress fostered and upon which the United States has levied in large sums for its revenue—revenue which it sorely needs to-day.

Mr. SPENCER. Does not the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] think that it is quite within the power of the President by his own proclamation to at once terminate war-time prohibition, if in his judgment he sees fit so to do? Does not the Senator remember that the war-time prohibition by the express terms of the act was to continue in effect until "the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States"? Is not the power to end it a matter entirely within his immediate control?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, my understanding is that the President has been advised by his constitutional adviser, the Attorney General, that as a matter of fact, and as a matter more particularly of international law, the war is not yet over; that the war is not over for purposes of this legislation until the President does proclaim peace, and inasmuch as peace depends upon the ratification of the treaty with Germany, which we have not yet accomplished, there is not the legal condition which would warrant the President in saying so. I think the Senator will agree with me that it is necessary for the President to proclaim peace before there is actually peace, and before he can consistently say that the war is over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, there is an old legal axiom, "Qui haerit in litera haerit in cortice," the man who sticks to the letter sticks only to the bark, and never gets at the kernel. Certainly no man can read the war-time emergency law without coming to the conclusion that the reason of the law was the existence of an actual war and the presence of an undemobilized force, and when the actual war has ended, and that army has been demobilized, the necessity for that war prohibition is ended. It did not mean that every man should be demobilized; it did not mean the technical paper ending of the war; it meant when the war as a fighting action had terminated, and when the process of demobilization had been substantially completed. Both those things are true now.

Mr. PHELAN. I believe, Mr. President, that that was the clear intention of Congress, but that Congress did not express it in as many words. Since then I understand a committee has been appointed for the purpose of drafting laws in order that the clear intention of Congress might be expressed in words. I do not think the Senator can construe the words of the law as warranting the President now in saying that we are in a state of peace, namely, that the war is over, because it is not over in a technical and legal sense. This is a constitutional Government, and the President, probably much to his regret, is bound by the language which Congress has enacted into law.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I only desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the wording of the law is conditioned upon the proclamation of peace. There is not a word about the final treaty of peace. War-time prohibition ends, according to the express language of the act, at the conclusion of the war, and the war is concluded. It is not a technicality; it is a fact.

Mr. PHELAN. But, Mr. President, the Senator admits that we are living now under an armistice, and that war possibly might be resumed. The armistice does not mean actually the conclusion of the war, because without a further declaration of war we might resume war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have the act before me, and this is the provision.

> That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the nation—

And so forth.

The President has authority under the law and must proclaim the termination of demobilization and the conclusion of the present war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Without expressing any view as to the correctness of the position just suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I invite his attention to what I understand to be the contention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who has this matter in charge. As I understood his contention, it was that the President of the United States could not make any proclamation that would affect the act until after the exchange of ratifications of the treaty, and that the President had no power to revoke the existing law until after the treaty had been ratified.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. KING. I so understood the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I probably said something from which the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] might have drawn that inference, but I do not want to be understood as taking that position. I think perhaps there is some debatable ground as to when there will be a conclusion of the war—whether when it has concluded, as a matter of fact, according to the statement of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], or whether there is no real conclusion of the war within the meaning of the act until there has been a proclamation of peace. That is a debatable question, perhaps; but if the Senator from Missouri is correct in his opinion, I agree with him that the President might make the proclamation now, and say that practically there had come the termination of demobilization and that the war had concluded. If the other construction is correct, of course, the original war-time prohibition act will be in effect until the proclamation of peace.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the wording of the law, I can not see how war-time prohibition will be repealed in any way until the conclusion of the present war—

> And thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

The President of the United States has power to-day to declare that to be a fact.

Mr. STERLING. There is some question as to what the expression "the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States," refers to, whether it refers to the date of the conclusion of the war, which shall be declared by the President of the United States or the termination of demobilization.

Mr. SPENCER. Does not the Senator remember that in one of those eloquent verbal utterances of the President after the 11th of November, 1918, he stated in language as follows:

> Thus ends the present war.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember that the President made that statement in a speech that he delivered before a joint session of the two Houses.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah give me the language of the act from which he read?

Mr. SMOOT. I will hand the Senator the act and he may read it.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not care to take any part in this discussion, but I do not want the occasion to pass without giving my protest to the construction that has been placed on the language. It reads as follows:

> That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. President, the theory of the Congress when it enacted the law was that the war would be terminated before demobilization took place. No one can doubt of that, if we will read the law. "And thereafter," the law reads. The President has no authority whatever to issue his proclamation until two things occur. One must be the conclusion of the present war and the other must be demobilization, and if the President should issue a proclamation before either one of those events has taken place it would be null and void and of no effect whatever. The idea that some Senators seem to have that the President can terminate the prohibition law at any time by a proclamation, it seems to me, will not bear the reasoning of logic. The law is purposely framed so that he has no power to declare war prohibition at an end until those two things occur. What has actually taken place, I presume, is that demobilization took place before the war was over, something that the framers of the statute had not contemplated. But in a legal sense the war is not over now. We have only suspended hostilities under an armistice. We are at war now with Germany, in a legal sense, the same as we have been at any other time. The war is not over. In my judgment, the President, if he has been advised, as the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] says, that it is not proper for him to issue this proclamation now, has been correctly advised. I do not see how you can reach any other conclusion than that under the law as it stands now he has no authority to issue a proclamation, because the war is not yet over.

It has happened in history lots of times where an armistice has been declared and hostilities suspended, no agreement has been reached under the terms of the armistice, and active war has again taken place. We had that occur in the surrender of Johnson's army in the Civil War when Sherman accepted the terms of peace, but they were rejected at Washington. Nobody believes that will happen now, but in a legal sense it might occur. There is not any ending of the war yet.

Now, as to demobilization, I have my doubt about that. I do not know what the facts are except what I have read in the papers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the two things which the law specifically states must occur, "the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States."

Mr. NORRIS. The President of the United States being Commander of the Army, will know before anyone else will know, and will know definitely, when demobilization takes place.

Mr. SMOOT. But that the law itself gives that power to the President, of course the Senator will admit.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but it is based on two things that must occur. Demobilization may be complete. I can not say as to that; I do not know, but the President does. He is the head of the Army, and he knows.

Mr. SMOOT. But the wording of the law is such that it seems to me it is entirely in the hands of the President. The act says:

> The date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the President has no right to fix the date as long as we are in a state of war, and that state will continue until some legal action is taken to discontinue it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The war-time prohibition act was passed in order to protect the public while the United States was recruiting and organizing an army and had the soldiers in camp in the United States. There is nothing of that kind going on now. It was further intended to protect the troops in demobilization. The Senator says he has no authoritative information that all of them are demobilized, but is it not common knowledge that the Army has been reduced below the size of the Regular Army now, and that there is no demobilization going on in the United States and has been none for three months, except in one or two camps in one or two States out of the 48? The reason for this law having ceased, is there any possible ground for passing another law to make it effective at this time, as is now proposed?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator is arguing a proposition that, in my judgment, is not involved here. I am not going to argue the question as to whether the particular war prohibition law that is involved in the veto message ought to have been passed. That is an entirely different proposition. The question before the Senate now is whether we will go into legislative session in order that the Senator from South Dakota may call up the veto message and have a vote taken on it.

I am contending that the war is not over, that there is still a state of war, and that the President has no authority to revoke war-time prohibition until the war is over. Let me read the language again:

> That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the war and thereafter——

The theory was that demobilization would take place after the war was over. It is probably true, from what the Senator says, that demobilization has taken place first, but it still leaves in the law one of the requisite things upon which the President must base his proclamation, and that is a state of war. Until that has passed away he has not any authority to issue any proclamation. Otherwise, if the President could arbitrarily fix it, then he might have done it the next day after the law was passed and said, "I declare demobilization to have taken place and that the war is over and prohibition is abandoned." That would not have made it so. Nobody after reading the law would have contended for a moment that that was a legal suspension of the law, and it seems to me that, in a legal sense, the same thing exists now that has existed all the time.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator may be technically correct, but there is no justification for passing a law upon a technical state of affairs when there are no facts to justify it.

Mr. NORRIS. We are not now engaged in passing a law.

Mr. SHIELDS. Just let me say——

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me refer to what the Senator said. I am referring to a law we have passed. The Senator has reference to another measure that has been vetoed, and that is outside of this question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let me call the Senator's attention to what the President said in his veto message:

> The subject matter treated in this measure deals with two distinct phases of the prohibition legislation. One part of the act under consideration seeks to enforce war-time prohibition. The other provides for the enforcement which was made necessary by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

Now, the Senator says he does not know whether the President knew they had been demobilized or not. The President does know, and he says it has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably so, but my sole objection to what the Senator urges still exists, that the Senator from Tennessee is arguing about a law that is involved in the veto message. I am not. For the present I am not considering that. At the present time that is not involved. The question here is the question raised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], Has the President the authority under the law to issue a proclamation that shall repeal the prohibition war-time statute?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I contend that he has no such authority now. Nothing that the Senator has said bears on it. What he has said bears on the wisdom or the unwisdom of Congress in passing the law at a time when the President says there is no further use for it. That is an entirely different proposition. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. In the first place, the President has issued his proclamation that demobilization has taken effect. He has issued it in this statement. Therefore, so far as he can affect the matter, the war-time prohibition law is now out of effect. The question which the Senator is discussing is whether he had a right to do it. Whether he has done it prematurely is a question for the courts and not a question for the Senate, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. The President has not issued a proclamation of the kind I am speaking of.

Mr. FALL. I thought the Senator agreed with the Senator from Tennessee that he had.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee claims that he has issued a proclamation. He sent a veto message here that is an argument against the passage of the bill that he vetoed. I claim that it has not anything whatever to do with the question of whether the President has authority, under the existing law, to issue a proclamation that shall repeal war-time prohibition as it now stands.

Mr. FALL. The proclamation does not repeal war-time prohibition nor did the law provide that it should do so. The proclamation simply gives publicity to a fact, and that publicity is given through the officer who is entitled to give it. The President of the United States issues proclamations for the United States. It makes no difference what the wording is, so long as he gives publicity to the public generally of the status which the Congress of the United States has fixed as terminating a certain condition, and that condition, in my judgment, is terminated.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is right, and perhaps what I have said would bear the criticism he has made that the President does not terminate it. He issues a proclamation which fixes the date when it is terminated, but the statute fixes the condition under which he has the legal right to issue that proclamation, and one of those conditions is that the war is over, and I do not think anybody will claim that it is over. We might have to mobilize an army yet in this war and send another army to Germany. We do not know, in a legal sense, but what we will have more men there in a year from now than we had there a year ago. The war is not technically over. We are in a state of war now.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I can not allow the statement of the Senator to go unchallenged, because I have insisted, and I still insist, that both as a matter of fact and as a matter of law this country has been at peace with Germany now for three or four months, that the President has so said, that the President has suspended, as it is probable he may do, the trading-with-the-enemy act, that we are now trading actually with Germany, and that no one can be punished under the law to-day for trading with Germany. The matter of peace is a status, and to contend otherwise would be simply to adopt the argument of the Senator, as I understand it, that although we might ratify the treaty of peace ourselves to-day and if the President did not thereupon issue his proclamation that the Army was demobilized this legislation would continue on the statute books forever.

Mr. NORRIS. The condition of peace is a status, it is true, but it is a status that the President of the United States has not any authority to fix. Congress could bring about a legal termination of the war and bring about a status of peace by the passage of a resolution similar to the one which the Senator from New Mexico introduced. I have no doubt of that, and it would be a legal establishment of peace. But now legally we are in a state of war, and it does not make it otherwise because somebody is trading with somebody in Germany either. The law specifically states that before the President can issue that proclamation the war must be terminated, and it has not been terminated.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I offer a resolution on this subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California desire the resolution to be read?

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from California the purport of it. I make a point of order that there is a question pending before the Senate and that the Senator's resolution is out of order.

Mr. PHELAN. Has the Senator asked me a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota makes the point of order that the Senator from California has spoken twice upon this question?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no. I have not made that point of order, nor do I desire to do so. I thought the Senator had offered a resolution.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from California has offered a resolution, and the Senator from South Dakota has requested him to express to the Senator the purport of it, but was cut off by the point of order which the Senator made.

Mr. STERLING. On reflection I will say to the Senator from California that I object to his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is out of order and the point of order is sustained. The Chair assumed that possibly the Senator from California desired to use it in the nature of an observation on the pending question.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, there seems to be a disagreement among Senators as to the meaning of the language in the war-time prohibition act, and my thought was to offer a method of solution which would have cut off the debate very effectively, by the adoption of an interpretative resolution of this kind:

Whereas the President, in his address to Congress on November 18, 1918, said, "The war thus comes to an end, for having accepted the armistice it will be impossible for the German command to renew it"; and

Whereas demobolization is conceded: Therefore

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that, for the purposes of the war-time prohibition act, the war has been concluded and demobilization has been accomplished.

Does the Chair rule the resolution is out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. PHELAN. Then I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. STERLING. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the Senator from South Dakota, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). As has been stated by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote not knowing how he would vote if present. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], but I understand that if present he would vote on this question as I intended to do, and I feel I am permitted to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. DILINGHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois, which I transfer to my colleague, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 38, as follows:

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent on account of illness in their families.

So Mr. STERLING's motion was agreed to, and the Senate returned to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, together with the veto message of the President withholding his approval therefrom, and the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask what the pending motion is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether, notwithstanding the objections of the President, the bill shall pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not so understand, Mr. President. The Senate has just voted to go into legislative session. Now, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill. Is that the motion?

Mr. LODGE. The bill has been laid before the Senate by the Chair. It involves a privileged matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the bill is before the Senate at this moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the pending question, Mr. President?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is, Shall the bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. ASHURST. The question is not debatable.

Mr. KING. I should like to have the veto message of the President read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the message from the House of Representatives and the veto message of the President of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
October 27, 1919.

The President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, with his objections thereto, the House proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning, without my signature, H. R. 6810, "An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries."

The subject matter treated in this measure deals with two distinct phases of the prohibition legislation. One part of the act under consideration seeks to enforce war-time prohibition. The other provides for the enforcement which was made necessary by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

It will not be difficult for Congress in considering this important matter to separate these two questions and effectively to legislate regarding them, making the proper distinction between temporary causes which arose out of war-time emergencies and those like the constitutional amendment of prohibition which is now part of the fundamental law of the country. In all matters having to do with the personal habits and customs of large numbers of our people we must be certain that the established processes of legal change are followed. In no other way can the salutary object sought to be accomplished by great reforms of this character be made satisfactory and permanent.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
27 October, 1919.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay a vote, but I wish to say just a word in regard to the vote which I am about to cast.

I have always opposed constitutional prohibition. I voted against it. I have not believed in putting prohibition into the Constitution of the United States, and I have not changed my view; but the country decided to put it in the Constitution of the United States, and then it became the obvious duty of Congress to supply the law necessary for its enforcement. There is no greater evil in our system of government than unenforced constitutional provisions. For that reason I voted for the bill which has just been vetoed.

I see no force in the President's distinction. The language of the war-time prohibition act is that it shall last "until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization." The President has declared in his annual message that the war is at an end; he has declared in this message that demobilization is complete. Therefore, Mr. President, I see no force in the objection; but I think at this time to prevent this bill from becoming a law in the present disturbed conditions of the country would be a great misfortune. So I shall vote to pass the bill over the President's veto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. SMOOT, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. POINDEXTER demanded the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not necessary to order the yeas and nays; that the vote must be taken in that way. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is detained on account of illness in his family. He has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Under the announcement of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] as to how my pair would vote if present, I am at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I understand, however, that he would vote "yea" on this proposition, so I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. Having a general pair with him, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] are paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate by illness in their families. I have been especially requested to announce that if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily detained on official business.

The roll call resulted—yeas 65, nays 20, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. (At 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) On this question the yeas are 65 and the nays are 20. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate take up the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 10, 12, 28, 31, 34, 35, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 55, 62, 63, 64, 72, and 73.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 7, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 36, 37, 38, 39, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 58, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

"Authority is hereby granted to the director of the Council of National Defense to expend during the fiscal year 1920 the sum of $32,000 from the funds now to the credit of the committee on public information for necessary expenses incurred therefor since July 1, 1919, and for the expenses of auditing and closing the accounts and affairs of said committee. All unexpended balances of appropriations for and allotments to the committee on public information shall remain available for payment under the direction of the director of the Council of National Defense of such liabilities as were actually and necessarily incurred by the committee prior to June 30, 1919: Provided, That $1,000,000 of such appropriations and allotments shall be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "continuing" and insert in lieu thereof the word "completing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five," and in line 6 strike out "$1,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after line 15; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,863,176"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

"Ordnance reservation civilian schools: Authority is granted for the expenditure during the fiscal year 1920 of not to exceed $45,000 from appropriations heretofore made for the 'purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon,' for the operation and maintenance on ordnance reservations at Amatol and Mays Landing, N. J., Nitro, W. Va., Jacksonville, Tenn., Penniman, Va., Sheffield and Muscle Shoals, Ala., and Tullytown, Pa., of schools for children of persons employed thereon, where public schools are not conveniently available for such children, including salaries, supplies, stationery, and industrial work, replacement and repair of books and equipment, and all incidental and necessary expenses in connection therewith."

And on page 11 of the bill, in line 10, strike out "1919" and insert in lieu thereof "1910."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT.

"RENT.

"For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, fiscal year 1919, $175.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$6,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500," and in line 4 strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$333.34"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and, in line 5, strike out "$666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600," and, in line 3, strike out $666.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$45,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF LABOR.

"For salaries and expenses of the international conference of labor, as follows:

"United States Government executive staff: For two and one-half months, at monthly compensation as follows: Assistant to the secretary, $450; first assistant, $300; three executive assistants, at $200 each; two assistants at hotels, at $200 each; private secretary, $200; two stenographers, at $150 each; typist, $125; and two messengers, at $75 each; in all, $6,312.50.

"Conference staff, for two months, at monthly compensation as follows: Two stenographers, at $150 each; two deputy secretaries, at $300 each; four subsecretaries (for commissions), at $200 each; four interpreters, at $200 each; three English-French translators, at $200 each; three French-English translators, at $200 each; six French stenographers, at $83.33 each; six English stenographers, at $150 each; chief messenger, $125; eight messengers, at $75 each; expenses, at not exceeding $10 per diem for each person, $12,000; in all, $23,649.96.

"Chief clerk's office, for two months, at monthly compensation, as follows: Chief clerk, $200; assistant chief clerk, $150; and stenographer, $150; in all, $1,000.

"Expenses: For reporting proceedings, $20,000; printing proceedings, $10,000; paper, $2,500; contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $33,500.

"Total, international conference of labor, $64,462.46: Provided, That all accounting in connection with the conference shall be done by the disbursing officer of the Department of Labor: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for the international conference of labor shall be available for the payment of an allowance for per diem expenses in lieu of subsistence to any person residing in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That this sum shall not be supplemented by expenditures from any other appropriation nor shall any part of this or any other appropriation be used for telegraphing or cabling the proceedings of the said conference."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$1,075"; and the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the item which would enable the War Department, through the Air Service, to purchase airplanes has been eliminated from the bill?

Mr. WARREN. In reply to the Senator from New York regarding aviation, I have to say that it was eliminated in conference, the House conferees resisting continuously until the last item in the bill. So it goes out, together with the item concerning $250,000 worth of tools which the Committee on Military Affairs reported favorably to the Senate, and which was included in the bill. That was also eliminated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming if that last item was not a duplicate of the bill which the Committee on Military Affairs reported, authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer the title of not to exceed $250,000 worth of machine tools from the War Department to the National Board for Vocational Training?

Mr. WARREN. Precisely; it was included with the amendment offered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the language was exactly the same as reported from that committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the second item alluded to by the Senator from Wyoming, while important, is not as important as the other one, which has to do with the Air Service.

I desire to say that I think I very thoroughly understand the difficulties which the Senate conferees encountered with the House conferees in a discussion of this item, and I do not wish to seem to reflect in the slightest degree upon the Senate conferees in yielding upon the item. The other House feels very, very strongly about some of the matters affecting appropriations for the War Department, and I know, as well as any other Senator, how difficult it is to persuade them to a different view.

But, Mr. President, I think it well at this time to call the attention of the Senate to the situation which exists in the Air Service. Senators will remember that when the annual appropriation bill for the support of the Army was before the Senate, the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, after being requested to recommend an appropriation of $83,000,000 for the support of the Air Service, including new construction programs, recommended to the Senate an appropriation of $55,000,000. The Senate passed the bill with the item at that figure in it.

In conference the Senate conferees offered to compromise, as it were, on an appropriation of $40,000,000, contending that without such a sum it would be utterly impossible for the Air Service to continue any development worthy of the name and at the same time maintain its personnel and establishment. The House conferees, however, and the House itself were adamant upon the proposition, and finally an appropriation of $25,000,000 was agreed upon, and became a part of the appropriation bill as signed by the President.

The inevitable has happened, just as was said upon the floor of the Senate at the time. The appropriation made in the annual appropriation bill is so small that the result is that the Air Service for the next fiscal year can not build any airplanes for the Army. In other words, this great country, at a time when all other countries are exerting themselves to the utmost to advance this new and wonderful art of flying, to encourage the commercial use of airplanes, to equip their military forces with machines of the latest design and the greatest efficiency—while every other country worthy of being called a great country is working along these lines, the United States, and the United States alone, declines to take one step toward enabling our people to come even within hailing distance of the progress of the art.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it not true that the War and Navy Departments have no coordinate and integrate plan for the development of an air service? And is it not true that in other countries a measure of coordination and acccommodation of differences has been achieved?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can answer both questions in the affirmative, to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Mr. McCORMICK. And in this country there is no common plan or purpose between the Navy and War Departments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is no common plan or purpose or project between the Navy and the War Departments, or between any of the departments of the Government. We have no policy whatsoever.

We are in a shameful and disgraceful position, from which we should emerge at the earliest possible time. Great Britain and France and other countries, recognizing the tremendous future of aviation for commercial purposes, have already organized new departments of government to take over the management and encouragement of this new industry, this new and great means of transportation. That is what it is, a new means of transportation. They are fully confident that within two or three years aviation as a means of transportation will become of tremendous commercial value, and, in fact, to-day it is being used commercially upon the Continent and in the British Isles.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may continue my answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois, I think the time must come, Mr. President, and I hope it will come very soon, when Congress will resolve to erect a separate department of aeronautics, which shall take charge of the encouragement of this new art, which bids fair to be just as important in its element as transportation upon the seas is important in its element and transportation upon the land is important upon its element.

Mr. McCORMICK. When I first interrupted the Senator from New York it was for the purpose of securing for the Senate his informed judgment on the fact that other countries have coordinated air services and America has none. Further than that I wanted to raise a question on which we ought to have his opinion. So long as the War and Navy Departments have no developed plan, is there any wisdom in Congress appropriating great and, if you please, insufficient sums, because unwisely spent, for the development, not of a thought-out and coordinated plan, but for a sort of haphazard scheme?

The very question which must have confronted the Committee on Military Affairs confronted the Committee on Naval Affairs, and nearly half the members of that committee, if I remember aright, shrunk from voting for great appropriations for a separate naval air service, and only yielded their judgment to the urgent importunities of other members of the committee who felt that appropriations must be made at this time, even though there was no rational plan.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not stand here to defend our present system, or, rather, the lack of it. But it is fair to say that the Army has a program of its own, which, of course, is strictly military, and the Navy has a program of its own, which, of course, is strictly naval in character. So far as each goes, I think they are fairly good. Neither of them, nor the two taken together, solve the problem in a general way. The activities of both combined are not adequate, and never can be adequate, to handle this enormous project, which has aspects which are far more important than the merely military or naval aspects. The commercial aspect is the thing which is going to be important, and already is important.

But we are in this situation, and I may remind the Senator from Illinois of the fact. Just before the armistice, after grave discouragement, and I will be perfectly frank and say after grave waste of funds, this country had finally gotten into the position where it had built up a great industry capable of turning out a very large number of planes and a very large number of engines every month. With the armistice, the contracts were canceled. All those plants have been closed down. Nothing has been done by the Government, or by any other agency, to see to it that there remains for the time being some little remnant of an aeroplane manufacturing industry in the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is that because there has been a default of any appropriation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is because the Congress has not appropriated money in sufficient quantities to keep these factories running, even at a very much reduced rate of production. What is the result? In the month of July, 1919, there were only 14 airplanes manufactured in the United States. In Great Britain there were 2,000. That indicates where we are going; or, rather, where other people are going in the development of this business, and how we are standing still.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to ask if it is the Senator's purpose to have the conference report rejected and to try another conference on this proposition? I am in hearty sympathy with the object of the appropriation made by the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would not undertake alone the responsibility of asking that that be done. I would prefer to consult with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming. I want to say very frankly that I understand the feeling of the House of Representatives on this matter. They are adamant. They are opposed, apparently overwhelmingly, to any financial encouragement of the aviation industry under the present auspices. I am not opposed to it. I am in favor of it within reasonable limits.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say that if the Senator feels like taking that responsibility, it will not be a personal one by any means, because I think there are quite a large number of his colleagues who will support him to the best of their ability. I heartily sympathize with every criticism that the Senator has made of this situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not attempt to defeat the conference report. I share entirely the views of the House of Representatives, and I think that there are other Senators who entertain the same views. So long as the present control of the aircraft production remains in the hands of those now managing it, I feel sure that no very extensive appropriation will be made. The waste of the War Department has been so great as to cause the resentment of the American people against the scandals and the misconduct and the misappropriations that have been entailed in regard to aircraft production.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. KING. The Senator will pardon me. We made a very large appropriation, I think, $25,000,000. Certainly $25,000,000 ought to go somewhere, notwithstanding the extravagance of the War Department in handling appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate at length on this question, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has brought up another phase of it. I agree with the Senator from Utah that there has been extravagance and waste, but I assert that the men who were responsible for that are no longer in charge of the aviation program. It is not my business one way or the other to defend the War Department, but I think justice should be done to the men who are to-day in charge of the Air Service of the United States Army. I have entire confidence in the Director of Air Service and his principal assistant, Gen. Mitchell. They have not been guilty of extravagance so far as our committee can ascertain. They did not come into charge of this work until after the armistice. Since they have come in charge they have not had any money to expend in great quantities in the building of planes. They have asked the Congress for sums of money which will enable them during the next 18 months to build 600 planes, as they stated to the Military Affairs Committee; and, incidentally, I may say to the Senator from Utah that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate passed upon this proposed item before it was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and passed upon its unanimously, without one dissenting vote, because we were convinced that it was our duty to give these people a chance to build some airplanes, at least, in which our military fliers could operate. We have nothing left now but the famous DH–4 machines, which are obsolescent and imperfect, and are deficient in many respects.

Mr. McCORMICK. For military purposes?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For military purposes or for any purposes. They are out of date. This art is moving along from month to month.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Well within the time that will be required for the completion of the machines provided for by this $15,000,000 appropriation, even such obsolescent planes as we have will be worn out, and the War Department will be left without anything in the way of a ship to take the air.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It may be of interest to know—and it is no longer a secret, because it has been testified before the Committee on Military Affairs—that we can not muster three squadrons of aeroplanes to send across any neighboring border to-day, and what we may send would be in obsolete machines. That thing can not go on indefinitely. It is all very well for Senators to entertain prejudice against those who happen to be in authority, but we must think of the country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. One might just as well say that we never should build another battleship because the first battleship, the Texas, was a failure. Merely because during the war we had a most unfortunate and distressing experience in the production of aircraft, that is not a valid argument in behalf of the proposal that we shall never build any more aircraft, and that is the proposal which confronts us. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I indorse fully, and with all the earnestness I can express, the feelings and sentiments of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I notice that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] thought we might gain something by sending this report back to conference. I have no feeling about it; if that should be the wish of the Senate, I would be perfectly willing. I think, however, we would be in better condition to take it up later, when it should be taken up, than to send it back to another conference now. Indeed, the unfortunate part of it was that it was a matter of contention upon the part of the House that the Department of the Treasury did not bring it to the House in the shape of an estimate, but that the War Department brought it directly to the Senate. The Senate Committee on Appropriations could not entertain it in the form it was in. If put in the bill, it could have gone out on the point of order had any one Senator made that point. However, it went to the Committee on Military Affairs, as the Senator states, and was unanimously indorsed, and thus it became in order. I think in this case we would lose ground, rather than gain, to send it back to conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have indicated, at least upon two occasions in my remarks on the floor, that I understand the nature of the position with which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is confronted. I am inclined to agree with him that nothing would be gained by sending the report back for this one purpose alone, but I have felt it my duty to call attention to the situation. To-day this great industry has all but utterly perished.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In just a moment, Mr. President. If you permit it to perish now, if you forbid it in effect to get any assistance whatsoever in tiding over the period of time, which most people put at two or three years, before the art will be thoroughly commercialized and become commercially profitable, you will not catch up in 25 years. Men will go out of business. There are only a baker's dozen of them in it to-day. They have given up almost all hope of building any more planes in the United States. The Post Office Department has contracts for a few, perhaps a dozen or so; I do not know how many. The Army has contracts for none except half a dozen experimental planes of three different types, two units of each type. The Army now believes, and the best fliers in the Army believe, that we have developed in those experimental types—machines, as it were, built by hand—planes and engines which are superior in their classes to anything known abroad. They have been tested to the limit. They have shown results distinctly favorable, as compared with anything known in England or France. Now, they ask Congress to give them some money to build some of these planes—upon a reduced scale, to be sure—in order that a year or 18 months from now, for that is the period that will be necessary in order that they may get them into quantity production, American military aviators will have a machine which can keep the air in an emergency. If it is not done, not one of the DH–4's will be fit for use 18 months from now. They are on the ragged edge now, and 18 months from now this great Republic will have nothing. I am not in favor of stripping our Air Service in that brutal and unwarranted way, even though we did waste money during the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not also a fact that England and France are encouraging, especially in South America, the establishment of air lines and the development of air service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. More than that, the British and French Governments have sent agents, and most of them are former British and French army officers, who are skilled aviators and fliers, to South American countries, and they are putting British and French machines of standard types upon those markets at a reduced cost. They have practically captured those markets. More than that, there are agents to-day in the United States, French officers in uniform, in the city of New York, selling French planes at a price infinitely below what any one of our manufacturers can produce them for, because, forsooth, our manufacturers can not produce one plane or six planes or 10 planes at the price per plane for which they can produce them if they are given orders for 600 or 1,000 planes. We are losing our own market.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. In addition to what the Senator from New York has just said and in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I should like to state that within the last few days I have received, and put into the record of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, a formal and official letter from our Department of State, signed by Mr. Adee, Assistant Secretary, addressed to the Aircraft Manufacturers' Association, setting forth officially the fact that representatives of certain foreign agents, English and French, are in South American countries, distributing the planes of their manufacturers, and asking the manufacturers' association here if they could not do something to bring American factories successfully in competition with these foreigners.

The situation is simply that the manufacturers' association here, fully cognizant of what is going on in those southern countries, are not sufficiently entrenched financially to enable them to enter into any such competition as is required in order to enable them to make any sort of headway against these other people. The people of whom the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] speaks and to whom Mr. Adee's letter refers are backed by their respective Governments. They are sent down there with full governmental authority, and naturally we here can not compete with that sort of thing.

Mr. President, if I may, I will add just one word further in answer to a question asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. The Senator asked if there were no method of coordination between the War and Navy Departments. In spite of the fact that both the War and Navy Departments say that there is a method, I undertake to say that there is worse than no method at all. I am in full sympathy with all the complaints made here by any Senator with reference to the lack of ability of those two departments to get together and coordinate their efforts in the proper direction.

This happened, and it is a fair illustration of the condition existing between the departments. The Post Office Department, having established a mail route between New York and Chicago, wanted to establish, in connection with it, five wireless stations. They went to the Navy Department and consulted them about it. The Navy Department said, "Yes; we have four which we will permit you to use, and we may build the fifth." But the Post Office Department did not wait, and started in to build five stations on its own little account. That is a fair illustration of the lack of coordination between the respective departments of the Government.

I agree most fully with what the Senator from New York said about the necessity for a separate department of aeronautics, and my feeling on that is best evidenced by the fact that some time ago I presented a bill which has that for its purpose. The bill is now before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and I think I am safe in saying it will be favorably reported, and that the committee, almost unanimously at least, will favor the establishment of a separate department of aeronautics, having been perfectly convinced that something of that kind is absolutely necessary.

But, Mr. President, if we pass that bill, as I hope we may and as I certainly believe we should, it will require some time following that in order to get the machinery of the new department going and to get the planes in process of manufacture. The manufacturers who are capable of producing planes in this country are very rapidly going out of business. The whole aircraft industry, which at the time of the signing of the armistice nearly a year ago had grown to very great proportions, has dwindled so that less than 10 per cent of its productive capacity is now in existence.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not producing.

Mr. NEW. I say only 10 per cent is in existence; it is not producing but is merely hanging by its eyelids and waiting to see if there is to be any further business. The business is of such a character that at this day American manufacturers can not go ahead; they can not keep the industry going on their own capital without Government assistance.

But, Mr. President, the appropriation of $15,000,000 would have served two purposes: First, it would have kept alive the remnant of the industry; and, second, it would have provided for the Government that which the Government is absolutely bound to have and which it can not under any circumstances get along without except to its great loss and discredit in the event of any emergency. Nobody knows when such an emergency may arise or where; but when it does, if it should occur any time within the next 18 months, I say to Senators here that the United States is going to be as badly off for airplanes as it was on the 6th day of April, 1917. That is the lamentable truth. We shall have to start all over again and in exactly the same extravagant way in which we went about it two years ago. It seems that we have learned nothing.

Like the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I understand, I think, the difficulties under which the Senate conferees labored. I have had some experience with the House Members who represented that body in this conference, and I know what their objections and their prejudices are.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not like the policy of delaying needed legislation because the other House is not in favor of it. I voted for this appropriation in the Committee on Appropriations, knowing at the time that properly it did not belong on a deficiency bill, and yet its importance is so great that I voted for it in committee. The Senate passed it, and why should we let the House hold us up? Why not send this conference report back to conference as we would a report involving any other necessary appropriation, fight it out, and give the House the benefit of the arguments which have been so ably presented here this afternoon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and which I cordially indorse. That is the only way to get legislation.

Senators talk about putting it off. If we do so, we shall have no airplanes and have nothing with which to build airplanes. The time to enact this legislation is now. We should insist on it and let the report go back to the House of Representatives and make a fight there in conference.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I very heartily concur in everything that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has just said. I can not vote to concur in the conference report with this item left out of it, realizing, as I do, its urgent necessity and the loss to the Government and the unfortunate situation in which we would be left by its elimination from the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana permit an inquiry?

Mr. NEW. Certainly, I will.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to say that $25,000,000—that is my recollection—was carried on the last regular appropriation bill for the Air Service. Why may not a portion of that $25,000,000 be devoted to the production of aircraft?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] will permit me, I have the figures here which will answer the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to hear the figures.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This matter was gone into in the Military Affairs Committee with the greatest care in a hearing attended by the chiefs of the Air Service and the Secretary of War. They laid before us the figures, which account for the use of the $25,000,000. Some of the figures may surprise the Senator from Utah; but it is well to remind ourselves that when the armistice overtook our tremendous production program it found us in possession of a hugh accumulation of aircraft supplies of every kind and description, together with a very large number of fields, covered with barracks and buildings and storehouses and hangars and machine shops, and a vast deal of material of one kind or another.

It was the policy, of course, of all branches of the Army to discharge the soldiers just as soon as they could after the armistice. Congress demanded that and the public demanded it; in fact, the Congress upon several occasions demanded that the War Department substitute civilian employees for soldiers wherever civilian employees could be substituted in the care of this property. It has been found by the experience of the Air Service, as a result of that policy, which all Americans insisted upon and upon which Congress insisted, that $13,000,000 has to be expended during this fiscal year for the payment of civilian employees of the Air Service in taking care of the great accumulation of property and the numerous aviation fields. That is only one item, but it accounts for a little more than half of the $25,000,000.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have the other items, if the Senator will let me continue.

Mr. KING. I will pretermit my inquiry until the Senator from New York shall have concluded.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, they are operating a salvage division, a division for the disposal of these materials. Their experience thus far shows that they must set aside $1,745,000 for that purpose. So that for the care of this property under the two items which I have just enumerated there must be expended $15,693,967.83. That leaves, roughly speaking, a little less than $10,000,000 out of the $25,000,000. Let us see what they can do with that. They have got to pay leases on flying fields of which they are still in possession. Default can not be made in the payment of leases to citizens who own the land. That costs $350,000.

They figure it vitally important to continue their experimental work on the six or eight machines which have been built practically by hand. Their efforts in this direction constitute a desperate attempt to keep pace with the latest developments. They have done good work along that line, but they only have six or eight machines. That experimental work is carried on at a special place. They have set aside for that purpose the small sum of $3,000,000. That does not seem too much money to expend in the effort to keep up with the scientific side of this wonderful game.

They also have to develop the lighter-than-air equipment, the dirigibles, and the balloons. One has only to remember the performance of the British R-34 to realize the possibilities and the potentialities of the lighter-than-air craft. So they have set aside $3,000,000 for that branch of the service. That is not much; that is a very modest figure for a great Government like ours to expend for this purpose.

To maintain the engines——

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I should like to say right there that the British Government has expended more than that much money on a single dirigible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The R-34 alone, just that one ship, cost over $3,000,000, and when they navigated that ship over here and back to London they demonstrated something which is of vital importance to the British Empire, and they know it. That was the precursor of British air lines from London to India and from London to Australia. Those courses are being laid out to-day. They have demonstrated that they can do it. The ships are designed; and they have put aside $230,000,000 to develop British aviation, to maintain the supremacy of Great Britain in the air, as it has been maintained upon the sea for 200 years, commercially as well as in a military sense.

Mr. NEW. That is the expenditure for one year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is for one year. We are not asking anything like that.

I call attention now to another item. To maintain the engines and the planes and provide the operating expenses of the existing equipment, which, mind you, is out of date already, they are compelled to put aside $2,000,000. For the maintenance and operation of the storehouses, the repair shops, and the fields themselves which have been selected for final purchase from a great number of fields—and the number of fields has been largely reduced—for the maintenance of those storehouses, which contain $500,000,000 worth of accumulated supplies, they ask another million dollars.

We, therefore, find that the last items aggregate $9,350,000, which, added to the $15,693,967, absorbs the entire $25,000,000; and yet not one new machine can be built.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I desire, because of the importance of the subject; to supplement what has been stated by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Indiana by one or two additional observations.

I saw a few days ago a cut of the new German dirigible, with a very interesting description of its character and of its capacity. Coupling that information with the eventful trip of the British dirigible, I was impressed with the idea that the only invasion which America really has to fear in the future is an aerial one. It has been demonstrated that a lighter-than-air machine can traverse the Atlantic Ocean with as much ease as an airplane can fly from the city of Washington to the city of New York. A fleet of dirigibles, carrying a very considerable number of men and equipped with the deadly explosives which modern science has evolved, could create more havoc upon the American coast than all the battleships of the world combined. We can easily defend ourselves against a marine invasion by the use of our submarines and our mines and our own battleships. We can only resist an aerial invasion by dirigibles and other aircraft.

Great Britain deserves the supremacy which she has secured and maintained for so many years of commerce and of the seas. Her farsightedness has insured both of them to her. She long ago perceived, and acted upon the perception, that the nation which controls the air in the future will continue to be the supreme people of the world—a proposition so obvious, so simple, and so inevitable that every thinking man must perceive it. France has acted, and is acting, upon that perception. We do not know what Japan is doing, because she conceals her activities behind an impenetrable veil of secrecy; but we do know that Japan is strengthening her hold upon China, and that she is in Siberia to stay, if possible; and she also realizes that her ambitions must necessarily collide with the interests of the great manufacturing nations of the world.

It is perfectly safe to assume—indeed, we must assume—that Japan is equally active in developing her air service and her air machinery.

Senators have spoken about the intrusion of commercial agents from France and from Great Britain in South America, with a view of monopolizing the particular business of supplying those countries with aircraft. I want to impress upon the Senate the fact that these nations are also in Mexico, whose Government is utilizing the services of many of its young men and teaching them aviation.

The Senator from New York has called attention to the fact—and it is a most deplorable fact—that we could not to-day, whatever our necessities, mobilize three squadrons of aircraft.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is, anything like modern aircraft.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; of course; and if they are not modern they are practically useless. We do not want, and we have demonstrated by our patience, and, sometimes I have thought, our ill-timed consideration, that we do not want trouble with Mexico; but the Mexican situation can not remain as it is forever; and in the event that it does become necessary to intervene we may find ourselves inferior even to Mexico in our aircraft development—a most pitiable thing to contemplate, and yet something which I think is highly probable.

Mr. President, I do not want to see the expenditure of a single unnecessary dollar by the Government of the United States, particularly in these times of high taxation, which burdens the people to a greater extent than ever known before, perhaps, in any country; but the development of aircraft—the future method of warfare, and one of the future methods of communication for the transit both of goods and of individuals—is indispensable to our national greatness, and also to our national protection and safety. Preparedness is a mockery these days, Mr. President, if it does not include preparedness in the air; and it is the one thing, or the principal thing, in which at present our situation is deplorable.

This $15,000,000, a considerable sum in itself, is only a beginning. I fully concede that. When we consider the enormous sums which Great Britain is expending in this line of development, and the almost equally enormous sums which France is expending in the same line of development, notwithstanding their almost bankrupt condition, it is positively criminal that the Government of the United States should be so handicapped at this juncture. I believe, Mr. President, that we should refuse to concur in this conference report and instruct our conferees to go back and meet with the conferees of the House of Representatives and stay there until we get this appropriation, even though the bill itself shall fail in consequence.

I feel deeply upon this subject, Mr. President, possibly because of my association with my colleagues upon the Committee on Military Affairs, before which day after day the seriousness of this situation and the necessity of doing something has been brought home to us constantly, continually, closely. So far as preparation is concerned, I think it is the most important element that we have now confronting us.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just a word.

I am not prepared at this time to commit myself to a separate department of aeronautics. I am studying that question, and do not know yet what conclusion will be reached about it; but I quite agree with the Senators who have discussed this matter as to the importance of maintaining the Air Service.

One effect of the lack of this sort of appropriation is withdrawing from the Air Service all encouragement and all support and having it practically go to pieces. It is not merely a question of failing to keep up in modern inventions and improvements of the airplane with other countries. It is a question of preserving the Air Service of the United States; and I think we all agree that that is the most important arm of the service and means of national defense. I believe that unless we take care of this situation as it exists now, and make this appropriation, the Air Service will suffer almost irretrievably.

For instance, out of 1,800 nonflying officers in the service to-day all except 180 are going out by the 1st of November. Only 180 nonflying officers will remain in the service after the 1st of November; and that merely illustrates what is bound to follow all through the service unless we provide the encouragement and support which ought to be given to that service.

The body at the other end of the Capitol I believe realize the importance of the service. Their position is that we ought first to decide upon a permanent program and policy with reference to it. The idea seems to be that perhaps by December or January we will have another deficiency bill, and can then take care of the needs of the Air Service, and perhaps of the Navy. It is a mistake not to provide the things originally carried in this bill for the Navy Department, but it is expected that the next deficiency bill will be sufficient to do that, and that they can get along until January.

There is no use in fiddling along about an important matter like this. December is nearly here. Before we can fairly turn around we will be right at the date they fix for the next appropriation bill. Why not take care of it now, in the present bill? Why wait? When we are faced with the inevitable thing, why not meet it bravely, and do it now, without mincing matters and withholding that support and that encouragement that ought to be granted to the service?

I am ready to vote against agreeing to the adoption of this report.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I dislike very much even to suggest putting any further burdens upon the shoulders of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee; but, Mr. President, the time has come when the Senate of the United States should take a determined stand and handle these matters in a businesslike way.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] a few moments ago told us that if this service was allowed to lapse for a period of 18 months, in his opinion it would take us 25 years to get back where we were at the close of the war, or the signing of the armistice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I meant to catch up with the progress which other nations would be making during those 25 years.

Mr. HENDERSON. But, further than that, Mr. President, it would cost us from three to four times in money what it would to appropriate, say, fifteen or twenty-five millions now and keep along with the pace. In other words, it is economy for the Congress of the United States to make these appropriations at the time they should be made and keep the work going along and not allow it to lapse and all go into desuetude and ruin and rack, as it will if we do not keep up the service at the present time.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield.

Mr. NEW. In confirmation of what the Senator from Nevada says, I want to call attention to the fact that some of the types of machines which have been adopted by us, and would be built by the War Department under this order, will cost at a minimum $79,000 if built by hand. They can be built for around $30,000 if put into production. That is the difference. When you get to the place where you are going to order any of these machines at all, if you are going to buy them piecemeal as they must be had, the cost will be, just as the Senator from Nevada is trying to point out, three times what it will be if you proceed in some intelligent fashion.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York stated a few moments ago that Great Britain in the month of July, 1919, had built 2,000 planes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON. May I ask the Senator from New York whether those planes were built by the Government or by the Government and individual firms?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were built almost entirely by private industry, encouraged by the Government, and sustained in part by Government appropriations.

Mr. HENDERSON. And in the United States, during the same month, only 19 planes were built?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; 14. The Senator is exaggerating. It is 14.

Mr. HENDERSON. Fourteen; and were those planes built with any Government aid at all?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were built for the Government.

Mr. HENDERSON. Under Government contracts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. I think the Post Office Department got half a dozen. The War Department got, I think, six, hand made—something like that. It is immaterial. There were only 14 altogether.

Mr. HENDERSON. It does not amount to anything?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not amount to anything.

Mr. NEW. And they were all made by one concern. There was just one concern in the United States that produced airplanes in the month of July.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I believe that the Senate should take a firm stand at this time and not allow this service to lapse and go back, and that we should make this appropriation; and I believe that the Appropriations Committee and the Military Affairs Committee can show the House of Representatives the necessity for such an appropriation.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee with reference to an appropriation made by the House aggregating $9,300,000, which consisted of a transfer of $7,300,000 and $2,000,000, respectively, which had previously been appropriated for "Pay of the Navy" and "Provisions, Navy," which was to be transferred so that it could be used as follows: Two million five hundred thousand dollars for maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks; $1,050,000 for maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts; $3,250,000 for construction and repair of vessels, Bureau of Construction and Repair; and $2,500,000 for engineering, Bureau of Steam Engineering.

Witnesses who appeared before the Naval Affairs Committee said it was their understanding, from estimates transmitted to the Appropriations Committee, that the navy-yard repair of vessels which are badly in need of repairs will stop unless this sum is appropriated. I have been told by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] that they have sufficient funds to run them until January.

Mr. WARREN. There is no trouble at all about it.

Mr. SWANSON. And they expect to have a deficiency bill in December which will take care of the situation?

Mr. WARREN. There is money enough to run a long time after January; but there are other matters that must be taken care of in December and January, and this matter will then be taken up in the House, I understand.

Mr. SWANSON. It will be taken up, so as to take care of the situation?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and will be considered.

Mr. SWANSON. And will be considered in December in the deficiency bill? Very well.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wonder at all at the feeling of Senators about wishing to obtain permission to use for the purpose of aeronautics some $15,000,000 heretofore. I beg of them, though, to remember that there is a right way and a wrong way to do all these things, this one included. We are unfortunate enough not to have had this presented, as it should have been, to the Treasury Department, transmitted in a regular estimate to the House, and in season for the House to consider it. Therefore when it comes up here first the House knows nothing of it, and it leaves them the ground to stand upon the rules until they can become better acquainted with it. I think I have said enough about my feelings concerning it to demonstrate that I would vote to take it back if I thought that was the way to reach favorable results soonest. But if such a motion is made I shall hope it will not prevail, because I think it would damage the cause. We meet again on the first Monday in December. By that time we ought to have all these matters, tools, if I may term them such, or estimates, and so forth, in such form that the House can not refuse to consider it affirmatively or negatively, and then when it comes to the Senate we will be in a much better position to handle it than now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am afraid we are going to duplicate our experience with ships in our dealing with the airplane service. For many years we talked about a policy for the development of an American merchant marine, but we did nothing. As a result we have appropriated since the war began a sum of money which equals the book value of all the ships of all the world in 1914. We have a lot of ships. Some of them are good and some of them are bad. Whether we will be able to develop an efficient American merchant marine is to be determined by the future. It looks as if we were following about the same policy with reference to the airplane service. If we do, we will have the same disastrous results. When the time comes that we need airships, we will not have them, and we will have to spend probably twice as much money as they would have cost if developed under a proper policy.

But I am not going to take any time to emphasize what has been said by other Senators with reference to the necessity of developing this service. I agree with everything they have said, and I hope that we will do something along these lines in the very near future.

I think I agree, however, with the chairman of the committee in that I do not believe anything can be accomplished by sending this measure back to conference. I do believe, however, that we ought to develop a policy. There ought to be a general plan so that the aircraft development service can be coordinated. We will get the best results in that way. Whenever we can get a plan of that sort adopted, we will not have so much difficulty about getting the necessary appropriations to develop it and carry it on.

I wanted to refer, however, to another item in the bill. I understand the appropriation for the Alaskan Railway has been placed at $6,000,000. I am satisfied that the conferees on the part of the Senate got the very best that they could. I am really surprised that they got so much, under the circumstances, although I think it would be economy for us to make an even more liberal appropriation than $6,000,000. We are going to complete the Alaskan Railroad. The more rapidly the work is carried on, the more fully the plans for its early completion are carried out, the cheaper the work will be done, and we will save money by appropriating the funds that are necessary to keep the force that may be gathered there and is organized, employed every day in the year that it can be employed. Plans have been made under which the work can be carried on. If those plans can be carried out, the work will be done more cheaply than if those plans are delayed.

The fiscal year ends right in the middle of the working season in Alaska, June 30. This $6,000,000, in my judgment, will no more than carry out the work expeditiously, economically, and effectively until about June 30 or the 1st of July. Without money that they can use for getting supplies or materials, and everything of that sort necessary to enable them to take advantage of the working season after July 1, it means simply delay in the completion of the road, and it will mean ultimately an increase in the cost of the road.

But I feel that there can be no question about the appropriation in the future for whatever is necessary to complete this road. I believe that the men in charge can make their plans, with the assurance that in the sundry civil bill of the next session ample appropriations will be made for the next fiscal year, beginning July 1. The only difficulty about it is that they can not make their contracts for the delivery of material that will be needed and be used after that time; but I think they can rest assured that they can make their plans and go just as far as they can go without actually having the money appropriated for them, with the assurance that they will get the money in the next regular bill.

I wanted to ask, for the RECORD, of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has had long experience here, if it is not his judgment that they can rest assured that the money that is necessary to carry on the work will be provided in the sundry civil bill at the next session of Congress, and that they can safely make their plans upon that basis?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the original law of $35,000,000 limit on the construction of the Alaskan Railroad will have been exhausted before the end of this calendar year, and the law passed to provide $17,000,000 more passed only a short time ago—a few days ago—so that the matter was not considered on the House side. The Interior Department came to us asking $17,000,000, the whole new amount provided for and put in on the principle that it would take that much to finish the road, and that there would be a percentage of gain to the forces conducting the construction to know that they were to get all the money on time.

But I will say to the Senator that they will not be able to use, for about 12 months, more than this $6,000,000, and it would take, as estimated, more than two years to finish the road.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is a member of the Appropriations Committee and a member of the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill. I have no idea that the Congress, having passed the bill to allow $17,000,000 more, will do otherwise than, in the next sundry civil bill, send us over from the House either the whole of what remains undisposed of or enough to carry it at least another year, and I am sure the Senate will feel that it is almost a certainty, the bill having passed both Houses, that they will provide the funds accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

On a division, the report was agreed to.

ROOSEVELT ON POPULAR GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have reprinted a speech made by Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 on popular government. It appears there were two of those speeches, one Senate Document No. 348 and one Senate Document No. 473 of the Sixty-second Congress. I would like to ask to have a reprint made of those two documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORT OF MISSION TO POLAND.

Mr. GERRY. Out of order I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 221) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas it is understood that the mission of the United States Government to Poland, headed by Hon. Henry Morgenthau, has completed its work, and Mr. Morgenthau has made a report to the Secretary of State: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to send to the Senate, if it is not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of said report.

HARRY GRAHAM.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Out of order I ask unanimous consent to submit a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (H. R. 8272) to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry, and I submit a report (No. 278) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is raised, and the bill will go over.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I confused the measure which the Senator from New York asked immediate consideration for a few moments ago with another bill, and I withdraw the objection that I then made to the immediate consideration of the measure.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry immediately below that of Capt. John Randolph.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEARL RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have a bridge bill which ought to pass immediately. I report from the Committee on Commerce favorably and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9697) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La., and I submit a report (No. 279) thereon. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is present and will explain the bill if any explanation is desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved February 27, 1917, to be built across the Pearl River at or near the fourth ward of the parish of Washington, State of Louisiana, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTMASTER AT UNION CITY, TENN.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in closed executive session, to confirm the nomination of George W. Phebus, jr., to be postmaster at Union City, Tenn., it being one of the appointments that was overlooked. There will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

POSTMASTER AT SPRINGDALE, ARK.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in closed executive session, to confirm the nomination of John P. Stafford as postmaster at Springdale, Ark.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, are these nominations presented in the way of committee reports?

Mr. KIRBY. These nominations have been agreed upon and already presented by the committee heretofore, but this one has been held up and overlooked.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are already upon the calendar?

Mr. KIRBY. No; they are not upon the calendar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then they must be presented in the way of a committee report. I have no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are presented as committee reports. Under the peculiar rules of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, when nominations are made they are referred to the Senators of the State from whence they come, and if they agree to them they are authorized to report them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are in the nature of committee reports, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination presented by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none. The nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

POSTMASTER AT ALTUS, OKLA.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to present a report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with reference to the confirmation of Samuel H. Starkey as postmaster at Altus, Okla. I ask for its present consideration as in closed executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

POSTMASTER AT ROCKY FORD, COLO.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I present a report with reference to the nomination of Thomas H. Stratton as postmaster at Rocky Ford, Colo., and I ask its immediate consideration as in closed executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 29, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate October 28 (legislative day, October 22), 1919.

POSTMASTERS.

ARKANSAS.

John P. Stafford, Springdale.

COLORADO.

Thomas H. Stratton, Rocky Ford.

OKLAHOMA.

Samuel H. Starkey, Altus.

TENNESSEE.

George W. Phebus, jr., Union City.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 28, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thee and would magnify Thy holy name, for the God like quality resident in the hearts of the American people which enables them to recognize and appreciate nobility of soul in the lowliest as well as the highest and most favored of mankind; hence the hand and heart of our people go out in the warmest welcome to the King and Queen of Belgium, to whom the world owes a debt of gratitude in the soldierly and womanly example.

The King and his little band of followers displayed valor and bravery unparalleled, in checking and holding back the horde of German invaders bent on destruction and humiliation of mankind, until the French and English could mobilize their forces and check the invaders; who proved themselves equal to the task in the Battle of the Marne and thus saved democracy, liberty, and justice to the world.

All hail! King of Belgium, and the little army of brave men who accomplished a feat of such magnitude that the world can never pay its debt of gratitude.

Long live nobility of soul inspired by the world's Great Exemplar, the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his correction.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, did not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] reserve all points of order on the report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he did.

Mr. BLANTON. Should it not be so stated in the Journal?

The SPEAKER. Although that is not the proper time to reserve points of order.

Mr. BLANTON. But they were reserved by the gentleman from Missouri and the Journal does not so state.

The SPEAKER. The Journal omitted what was superfluous. The Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, submitted last night and printed in the RECORD of October 27, 1919, contains a few clerical errors. For instance, in Senate amendments numbered 74 and 75 the words "Senate" and "House" are transposed. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report in order to have these clerical errors corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the conference report be rereferred to the conferees. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FIXING TIME OF RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertainty in respect to the hour when the exercises in the Senate in honor of the King of Belgium shall conclude, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may be permitted to declare the House in recess to-day at any time when he deems proper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the statement of Mr. Timothy Shea that the inclusion of the antistrike provision in the reorganization railroad bill would mean revolution.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, we have some regular business to do to-day, and I do not think the time should now be taken up by the address to which the gentleman refers. I object.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-five Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Chair is disposed to think that inasmuch as the King of the Belgians is expected to be here about 1.30 o'clock, that the House could not to advantage under conditions do any work before that time, and therefore under the discretion in him, the Chair now declares——

CONFERENCE REPORT, FIRST DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair withhold that while I present a conference report for printing? I present the corrected conference report on the first deficiency bill for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a conference report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiency in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years.

The SPEAKER. The conference report is ordered printed under the rule.

Mr. WINGO. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to do that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the conference report has been printed except the corrections, to which I called the attention of the House and the Speaker this morning. It seems to me it therefore would not be necessary to be printed again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it ought to be printed again, and it will be printed in the RECORD.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now declares the House in recess——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Until when?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in recess until after the reception to the King of the Belgians, which will probably come about half-past 1. It is impossible to state the exact hour until we hear from the Senate. The Chair can only say it would be wise for gentlemen wishing to be present to be here about half-past 1. We will stand in recess during those exercises. The House will not meet until the exercises are concluded.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

DURING THE RECESS.

RECEPTION TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

At 1.40 p. m. the doorkeeper announced His Majesty the King of the Belgians and his suite.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians and His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, the Duke of Brabant, escorted by Mr. MONDELL, Mr. PORTER, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and Mr. FLOOD, together with the suite of the King, entered the Hall of the House amid great applause.

His Majesty the King was escorted to the Speaker's rostrum.

Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians was seated in the Executive Gallery.

INTRODUCTION BY THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. Your Majesty, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, this is the first time that this Chamber has been visited by a reigning monarch, and I am sure we are all glad that our guest is the one to establish this new precedent. [Applause.] His royalty has been overshadowed by his heroism. [Applause.] Every nation has developed its hero in this war; indeed, every nation has developed innumerable heroes; but I think there is universal agreement that there has come out of the war one surpassing figure who has won the supreme admiration and sympathy of the whole world by his heroic bearing [applause], the most manly of kings and the most kingly of men, His Majesty the King of the Belgians. [Great applause.]

ADDRESS BY HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am profoundly grateful to Mr. Speaker of the House for his eloquent words of welcome.

I am happy to be able to bear to this Chamber, which embodies the living spirit of the American people, the greetings of Belgium, a democratic and parliamentarian State, created by the vote of the popular assembly of 1830, which proclaimed the independence of our Provinces. [Applause.]

It is a pleasure to recall that many of the provisions of our constitution were taken from your fundamental law, so that at the outset of her career Belgium was indebted to you. [Applause.]

Our two peoples have fought and triumphed together. The intervention of the American Army was the decisive factor in determining the victory. [Applause.]

I pay my respectful and sincere homage to the officers, the soldiers, and sailors who fell for a great cause on the battle fields of Europe and in the defense of the seas.

The hearts of Belgians, whom these heroes helped to liberate from the domination of the enemy, go out in profound gratitude to the wounded.

In their name I address to the wounded of the Great War the assurance of our affection and sympathy.

I express the gratitude of Belgium to those distinguished American citizens who gave themselves with such a rare spirit of sacrifice to the task of lightening the sufferings of the Belgian people.

In this noble assembly I solemnly thank the members of the Commission for Relief and the innumerable committees that helped it in its admirable efforts.

I salute in particular the names graven forever in our memories of Mr. Herbert Hoover and Mr. Brand Whitlock. [Applause.]

May this splendid American Nation, so richly endowed by nature, so magnificently served by its people, pursue in the serenity of its power its work of achievement, of culture, and of progress. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. His Majesty will be pleased to meet personally the Members of the House. [Applause.]

The King proceeded to the floor of the House and received the Members.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the Speaker (at 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) called the House to order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings during the recess may be printed and made a part of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the proceedings during the recess may be printed as a part of the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MINING OF COAL, OIL, PHOSPHATE, ETC.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2775, provided for in House resolution 358.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, pending that, will the gentleman yield for a question? I ask if, after the conclusion of this leasing bill, it is the intention to take up any other legislation this afternoon?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no information on that.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman from Wyoming that question?

Mr. MONDELL. What is the question?

Mr. BLANTON. If after the conclusion of the leasing bill this afternoon it is the intention to take up any other legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. That has not been my thought. I thought we would adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ASHBROOK indefinitely, on account of death of business associate, and for other purposes; and

To Mr. BELL, for two weeks, on account of important business.

MINING OF COAL, OIL, PHOSPHATE, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2775, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 30. That no lease issued under the authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet, except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. The lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease, and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease, and may with like consent surrender any legal subdivision of the area included within the lease. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property; a provision that such rules for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste as may be prescribed by said Secretary shall be observed, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency, provisions prohibiting the employment of any boy under the age of 16 or the employment of any girl or woman without regard to age in any mine below the surface, provisions securing the workmen complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to insure the fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare: Provided, That none of such provisions shall be in conflict with the laws of the State in which the leased property is situated: And provided further, That lessees must at all times furnish their products to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 70, strike out the proviso beginning in line 24, and including lines 1 and 2 on page 71, and insert in lieu thereof, after the word "necessary" in line 19, page 70, the following: "To insure the sale of the production of such leased lands to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices."

Mr. SINNOTT. May the amendment be reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is much more important than the attendance here at the moment would indicate. It disposes of the last of the natural resources of the territory owned by the United States. It is doubly important, because these resources once passing out of the hands of the United States under a lease granted under this act are no longer subject to the legislative action of Congress. In other words, when the terms of the lease have once been established by the lease itself, those terms can not then be changed by the action of the Congress until the expiration of the term of the lease itself. Therefore it is important that every safeguard to the right of the United States should be incorporated in the legislation at the outset, and that there should be incorporated in the lease itself every essential provision necessary for the safeguarding of the rights of the United States and the rights of the public.

Now, the section under consideration authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, as a condition in the lease, to make certain requirements with respect to the working conditions which shall prevail in the mines, to prevent monopoly, and otherwise safeguard the rights of the public and the United States. Then follows a proviso:

And provided further, That lessees must at all times furnish their products to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices.

This proviso is attached to this section as a sort of appendage. It is about as useful and about as effective in the place where it is located as a thirteenth cylinder on a gasoline engine. There is no way of enforcing it. It is simply a declaration of Congress, without any machinery for enforcement, that the product of these leased lands shall be sold to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices. My amendment simply provides that the Secretary may, as the condition of the lease, require that the products of the property leased shall be sold to the public and to the United States at reasonable prices. As a part of the lease or as a condition of the lease, the provision becomes effective, because it is subject to exactly the same limitation and the same powers as all the other provisions attached to the lease. And there is a machinery for enforcing it as a condition of the lease itself.

I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment, because it seems to me if it is proper to put such a provision in the bill at all, it ought to be put in in such a way as to be effective.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the language which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] seeks to strike out, if I may refer to the proceedings in another body, is what is known as the La Follette amendment, and it seems to me that the language which the gentleman wishes to insert improves this feature of the bill. I see no objection to adopting the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 70, strike out the proviso in lines 22, 23, and 24, concluding with the word "situated."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the language proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That none of such provisions shall be in conflict with the laws of the State in which the leased property is situated.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago with reference to the amendment which was adopted, this section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to provide, as a condition of the lease, that the miners employed in the mines leased under this act shall not be required to work more than eight hours a day; that a condition may be put into the lease prohibiting the employment of women and of girls underground, or the employment of boys under the age of 16 years. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior may make such provision in the lease as he may deem necessary in order to prevent monopoly. But these provisions are entirely nullified, or may be nullified entirely, by the proviso which I seek to strike out. If the State in which the leased land is located has a law which authorizes the employment of miners underground for a period of 10 or 12, or even 14 or 16, hours, then the Secretary of the Interior is absolutely impotent to put in the lease any condition in conflict with that provision. If the laws of the State contain any provision which permits the employment of women or girls underground, then the Secretary of the Interior could not put a condition in the lease which prohibits the employment of women and girls underground. If the State permits the employment of boys under the age of 16 years in the mines, then the Secretary is absolutely without power to put a condition in the lease which will prohibit that. If the State laws permit a monopoly of the oil or coal within the territory of that State, then the Secretary could put no limitation in the lease, the effect of which would be to prevent that monopoly.

Mr. Chairman, we have the right to make it a condition of the use of the public lands that they shall not be used in such a way as to injure the health of those who are employed upon them. We have a right to make it a condition of the lease that the lease shall not be used for the purpose of building up a monopoly. We have the right to require that the conditions of the lease shall provide that the property taken out, the output of the mine or of the well, shall not be used to enhance still further the wealth of those who already have enough. We have the right to require under the terms of this lease that the welfare of the United States shall be safeguarded in every respect, and that entirely without reference to the laws of the State in which the property is situated. So far as I know——

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. Would not the gentleman have these operations carried on under the laws of the State in which they exist?

Mr. ANDERSON. So far as I am concerned, I will never consent to the propostion that the Federal Government is obliged to carry on its operations with reference to laws that may be imposed by the States. To establish that policy would be to establish the proposition that the States could wholly nullify every provision that we have put into this section.

Mr. MAYS. Would the gentleman make this lease under this law contrary to the laws of the States?

Mr. ANDERSON. Without reference to the laws of the States.

Mr. MAYS. What authority would police these properties?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Federal Government has full authority to police them and can police them, but these provisions in no way abridge the police power of the States as it now exists.

Mr. MAYS. There is no provision in this bill for such action as that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not propose that the State shall be deprived of any power which it now has. I am objecting to a provision which proposes to limit the just and proper powers of the Federal Government in dealing with the lands which are the property of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not yet willing to subscribe to the idea that the people who happen to live in the public-land States have some peculiar claim to these oil wells and coal mines under the ground; that because they happen to be located out there in these States they have some rights with respect to this property which no other citizen of the United States has. This natural resource belongs to all the people of the United States, and while I am willing to concede that some consideration should be given to the fact that this property is taken outside of the purview of the taxation of the State I am not willing to vote for a provision which recognizes the doctrine that the State has the right to nullify the power of the Federal Government in the exercise of its right to protect itself and the citizens of the United States against monopoly or aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with what the gentleman from Minnesota has just said, but I think the gentleman from Minnesota totally misunderstands and misconstrues both the intent and the effect of this provision which he seeks to strike out.

Why, it would be perfectly monstrous if this committee had started out deliberately to so hamstring the Federal Government that it could not make proper regulations for the protection of life and for the establishment and maintenance of proper conditions of employment. There is no State in the Union which compels anybody to work any special number of hours. There are States which provide that they shall not work over a certain number of hours. There is no State in the Union which compels people to work in mines. There are provisions that certain people shall not work underground, for instance. A provision put into one of these leases which was not prohibited by the State law would not be in contravention of the law of the State.

The gentleman totally misunderstands the purpose of this paragraph. Its intent, I assume, is to prevent the Federal Government from putting in these leases any provision which would be contrary to the salutary provisions of State laws, and if that language is stricken out it would be possible for the Secretary of the Interior to insert conditions in the lease of a character that flew squarely in the face of the most necessary, essential, and salutary provisions of the laws of the States.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. I am in perfect harmony with the view and purpose of the gentleman from Minnesota, but I think that instead of accomplishing the purpose he seeks to accomplish he would, by striking out this language, produce a condition under which an employee of the Interior Department could write a lease and the Secretary could sign a lease containing provisions wholly out of harmony with most salutary and essential provisions of State laws.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why, this bill itself contains an eight-hour provision, which the Secretary of the Interior has to enforce; and he will enforce it unless your State law prohibits it.

Mr. MONDELL. What if there was a State law providing that men should not work underground more than six hours? There is a demand for that now. Does the gentleman think that a provision could be written into a lease under which a six-hour law of a State would be disregarded?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not under this provision as it stands now.

Mr. MONDELL. No; but if the gentleman's amendment carries, it could. Instead of being a limitation on the power of the Federal Government to protect, this is a limitation on the authority of the Federal Government to permit practices which the State law prohibits.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This language which the gentleman from Minnesota seeks to strike out is similar to the language which we have incorporated in all these conservation bills, saving to the States the rights which they have at the present time in their water powers, irrigation rights, and in their other resources.

The gentleman says he knows of no peculiar claim that the people of the West have in these matters. We have a peculiar claim, under the Constitution of the United States, and we assert that claim, of the right to local self-government, a claim to enact our own police laws, and we are not willing to surrender that right to the Secretary of the Interior or to anyone else. This section permits the Secretary of the Interior to embody in the lease regulations for the prevention of monopoly and other abuses not inconsistent with the laws of the State. Are we going to stand here and surrender to the Secretary of the Interior the right that we have in our State, the right to prevent monopolies and other abuses?

Then, again, the gentleman seeks to get around the provision of the Constitution in article 8 that only gives Federal legislative jurisdiction over property in our States when the consent of the State is given to that jurisdiction. These rights are sacred rights, and they were retained by us when the Constitution was framed. This bill relates only to the lands in the West. In nearly every State in the West we have laws for the prevention of monopoly and other abuses, laws in regard to the working of women and children, and we are not ready to surrender to the Secretary of the Interior the right to abrogate those laws; the Secretary of the Interior is seeking no such power. I hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you will begin with the third line on page 70 you will find the provision to which this proviso applies. It relates only to those things which have for their object the saving of waste, the proper conservation of human life, both as to sex and as to age. It does not say that you shall not make the workday less than eight hours, but it does say you shall not make it more than eight hours. Under the terms of this lease it prohibits the working in the mine of a woman or a child under a given age. Now, the provision which the gentleman from Minnesota seeks to strike out is one which permits the State to pass such a law permitting these things. Otherwise it has no force. The United States, by the terms of the lease that is to be made under this provision, is empowered and authorized to put into that lease provisions which make the safety of the people paramount; not that the State shall not make those laws still stronger, but that it shall not make them less so.

Mr. MAYS. Can the gentleman imagine any State passing a law allowing women to work in mines?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If you put in a provision that permits it to, it shows that somebody suspects that it may be done.

Mr. MAYS. That does not answer the question.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. There are States which have tried to annul the law prohibiting child labor, and have taken that law to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of contesting its validity.

Mr. MAYS. The absence of the law would not make such a provision.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If the gentleman's position is correct, why object to the striking out of the proviso?

Mr. SINNOTT. Because we do not want the laws passed in the States, laws against monopoly and against child labor and against women working in the mines, to be abrogated by anything the Secretary of the Interior may order.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. But the gentleman is making a mistake. This provision does not do that. It permits the State to pass any law it wants to pass. It only requires that in that law there shall not be a provision that they shall work more than 8 hours—that they shall work 12. It does not say you can not make the limit 6 hours. It only requires that a woman can not work in a mine under this lease. If the State makes it the same, that is not in conflict; but if, as the chairman of the committee has said, the Constitution of the United States is violated by such a provision, then the law will not hurt, because it will be noneffective.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman wants to put upon us the burden of taking this matter into court. Supposing the Secretary of the Interior makes some provision for the prevention of monopoly and the safeguarding of the public welfare that is contrary to the laws of my State, where the laws are most stringent in regard to women working. Is the law of the State to be set aside? It would be if there is any efficacy to the regulation.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The chairman of the committee is mistaken as to the effect of this provision. If the State makes a law which is stronger than the provision which the Secretary of the Interior incorporates into the lease, that law will apply. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Do you want the Secretary of the Interior, thousands of miles away here in Washington, to make laws for our States?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is exactly what this bill would do, and that is the policy you are trying to inflict upon us now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I ask five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Answering the gentleman from Colorado, we are not seeking to make laws. I take it the gentleman is a member of the committee and he prepared the provisions of this bill, or at least subscribed to them, and if the gentleman from Colorado subscribed to these provisions why does he not want them enforced? If you do not want these provisions, why did you put them in the bill? What is the necessity?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have been on this committee for about 11 years. This matter has never been suggested by anybody before. The most insane advocates of Federal control have never before tried to inflict upon the West the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to write all the laws and regulations for the Government of the development of our public domain.

It is the most absurd, tyrannical assumption we ever had presented on the floor of the House, and in violation of the rights of the Western States. It is a matter of principle and policy. I may say that our leases concerning the development of mines and the working of the women and children where women vote are a whole lot better than in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If I catch the logic of the gentleman, it is that it has never been mentioned before and therefore it is wrong. Next, that there is a worse condition in Nebraska than in Colorado and therefore they in Colorado ought to have it as bad as in Nebraska. That does not seem to me to be logical. And then as he assisted in preparing the provisions himself, what is the matter with them? Is it camouflage when he says we are going to try and keep the eight-hour day, that we are going to try to keep children out of the mines, that we are going to try to keep women out of the mines, and then do away with it?

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is it not true that this proviso could only operate to prevent writing provisions absolutely forbidden by the State laws? Could it in any way operate to prevent the Secretary from writing into the lease additional requirements? As I construe the proviso the only effect would be to say to the Secretary that he could not put in the least thing forbidden by the laws of the State, but it does not say that he could not put in particular requirements.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The gentleman is not asking a question; he is making an argument. The chairman says that under this provision the Secretary of the Interior could put in the condition that they must have an eight-hour day. Do they object to that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were—7 ayes and 32 noes. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 70, line 14, by adding a comma after the word "purchase."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 70, line 14, after the word "purchase," insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. That any lease issued under the provisions of this act may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located whenever the lessee fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act, of the lease, or of the general regulations promulgated under this act and in force at the date of the lease; and the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if it is the intention under this section to give any person a right of action except the lessee.

Mr. SINNOTT. The intention is to give the lessor the right.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Does the committee not think that those who would be suffering from violation of the terms with reference to combination, and so forth, ought to be given permission to institute an action?

Mr. SINNOTT. They can do so by instituting a complaint, and that is the way these actions are generally brought about.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. They would have to first obtain the cooperation of the Attorney General.

Mr. SINNOTT. They would present the matter to the United States district attorney in the particular locus.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. And unless they could convince him, they could secure no remedy.

Mr. SINNOTT. Action would not be commenced unless the Attorney General of the United States thought that they had facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the rights of the States or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have, including the right to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 71, line 16, after the word "act" strike out the colon, insert a comma, and add the following: "also to fix and determine and thereafter to readjust and change the boundary lines of any structure or oil or gas field for the purposes of this act."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make certain that the Secretary has the right to ascertain and determine the boundaries of the oil structures and fields. I think he has that right, but in order to make it absolutely sure, I offer the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. When would that apply? Before the leasing? They could not do it after a lease had been obtained.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no; for then a man's right would be vested. We are using the phrase the "known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field," and it may be possible that the courts would hold there is no such term. A law was passed at one time by Congress providing that certain things should be done in "mineral districts." The courts held that the term "a mineral district" was an uncertain, unknown term, and that the law, therefore, had no application; and if anything like that is hinted at in respect to this phrase, we want to make it sure that the Secretary has the right to say where the oil structure of the producing field is. I think he has the right now under the act, but it is in order to make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. RAKER. The testimony before the committee was that these geologic structures are fairly well defined, and can be found only by virtue of personal ascertainment upon the ground.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; that was the burden of the testimony, although some of the experts suggested that it was a very loose, ambiguous term, and if you give the Secretary the right to define these structures and fields, it will take away all uncertainty and ambiguity.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "proper," in line 14, page 71, the word "general."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 71, line 14, after the word "proper," insert the word "general."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think that possibly in some cases the Secretary may wish to make some specific rule? That might take away from him the right to make a specific rule.

Mr. RAKER. The matter, I think, was brought before the committee, and I believe it is the committee's view now that no rule should be made by the Secretary of the Interior that does not apply generally either to the coal mines or to the oil, gas, and phosphate leases, or whatever it might be under the law.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is true as to matters in general, but there may be some specific field or there may be some specific limited field as to which the Secretary ought to have the right to make some specific rule. I think we had the matter up in the committee.

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is that in practically every bill we provided that there must be general rules and regulations. I think you will find it in the water-power bill and in all of the other legislation where there are rules and regulations governing the disposition of the public lands, or the handling of them by the Secretary of the Interior, to the end that there can not be any specific or special rule made for that one case that no one else knows anything about. Every man should deal with the Secretary the same as though it was a general law.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am afraid that the gentleman's amendment would restrict and hamper the rights of the Secretary and that it would embarrass him in some cases. I prefer that the gentleman would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. Would not the gentleman's amendment compel the Secretary, in making surveys, for instance, to consider the smallest subdivision, 40 acres, whereas in many cases a portion of it—say 20 acres—could not have any coal on it, and the Secretary might want to make one specific rule with reference to that survey covering that particular subdivision of coal, and excluding from the coal area the 20 acres that had no coal upon it. I have known it to happen where the Secretary has been handicapped by virtue of such a regulation.

Mr. RAKER. The intention of the bill from the beginning to the end is to specify general conditions applicable to all.

This particular section does, but simply to make it specific I thought that we ought to have the word "general" in, so as to avoid any complications; but if the distinguished chairman of the committee thinks it is provided for, there is no need of using more words if we can avoid it, so I will withdraw it under the circumstances.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso, page 71, beginning in line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 71, line 16, strike out the proviso beginning with the word "Provided" and ending with the word "States."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I made this motion in order to ask the gentleman from Oregon or the gentleman from Wyoming, who is so happy at making explanations and interpretations when no interpretation is necessary, what the purpose of this proviso is. Is it contended by the committee that there is some right on the part of the State to tax the output of these mines or wells? What is the purpose of this proviso?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Oregon, who knows much more about this than I do, is so modest that he will not answer, I will say to the gentleman that a subsequent section is intended partly to reimburse the State for the losses they suffered by reason of withholding from taxation very great areas of very valuable land and even that provision in section 35 would not allow the State to accede to the communities to meet their obligations to their people unless they could tax the output on this property just the same as they tax the output of the other improvements. For instance, in my State——

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman makes a very curious argument on that proposition. Does the gentleman contend that the States have less out of this where they take 90 per cent of the total royalty provided in the bill than they would if they tax the output of the well?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is mistaken in the provision. Under the provision of section 35 the State gets 45 per cent. It goes into the reclamation fund; it is not a contribution directly to the citizens of the State or to the State in any sense. It is simply continuing the dedication of public funds for reclamation purposes. The other part is intended to compensate the States for their very great losses in tax values; and in addition to that, for instance, take, for example, my State: We tax oil and coal lands very heavily; that is, we tax lands and other values, and in addition to that when they are being worked we place a tax on the output; and at one time during the discussion of this legislation there was some question as to whether the State would have the right to tax the output of land the title to which is held in the Federal Government.

I think the States would, but this is intended to make clear and certain that the States would have that right and in order to make clear and certain, so far as the Federal statute may do it, the right of the State to tax improvements. I think the States would have the right to tax improvements in any event, but so far as this legislation can determine that matter it is proposed to be determined by the paragraph to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask that the gentleman from Wyoming have five minutes more and that I may occupy that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks that the gentleman from Wyoming have five minutes and that he may occupy that time.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman asks that he be allowed to use part of the time; that was part of the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand that is if the gentleman wants it.

Mr. MONDELL. I am yielding to the gentleman from Minnesota at his suggestion.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think this provision is entirely without any force. If the State has the right to tax the output of a Federal property, the Federal Government can not take away that right. If it has not that right, the Federal Government can not give that right except by the adoption of a law which is actually on the statute books.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me a moment of my time?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Minnesota in what he has just said—that this is very true; that without this language in the bill some agent or agency of the Federal Government might attempt to hold that the State had no right to tax these improvements and to provide an output tax. This legislation would at least have a restraining effect on the agents of the Federal Government.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. While I grant it would not change the state of facts, whatever they may be in this regard, it would restrain as an act of Congress the employees and officials of the Federal Government from asserting a claim against the right of a State to tax the output and to tax improvements.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentlemen is contending, then, the recognition of the right of a State to tax the output of the mine, regardless of what the law on the subject now may be?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is a recognition of that fact.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is exactly what I am afraid of. That is the reason I am opposed to it.

Mr. MONDELL. But does not the gentleman——

Mr. ANDERSON. I am perfectly willing the State shall have any right it has under the laws and Constitution of the United States. I am willing it should exercise that right, but I am not willing to put into this bill any provision, whether it is this provision or any other provision, which has the effect of abridging the right of a State or the effect of abridging the right of the Federal Government, whatever they may be.

Mr. MONDELL. I tried to make the purpose of this language, as I understood it, clear to the gentleman. This will at least restrain the Federal agents from denying the right of the State to tax, as it must tax, in order to live, all improvements and outputs from these properties. The States must do that or the States will cease to function. And this will at least restrain the officials of the Federal Government from attempting to deny that right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the amendment. I understand the amendment is to strike out the proviso——

The CHAIRMAN. Beginning on line 16.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the amendment ought to prevail. These are Government lands. Government officials and agents are authorized to negotiate leases with individuals and companies, and it is supposed that the terms of such leases will be such that lessees will be permitted to make only reasonable profits.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me, not now.

Will make a reasonable profit and conduct their business in a proper way in keeping with the lease, having in view the right of the United States, as it owns the land. Now, if this proviso stands, such leases having been made, the State could exercise the right to levy taxes upon all "improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets" of the lessee. Think of that power which the States are by this proviso invited to exercise.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Burdensome taxes might be imposed, operation by the lessee might be made unprofitable, and the property would be thrown back upon the Government loaded down with tax liens, and this law might be made a failure.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Practically destroying the leases altogether, and making it impossible for the Federal Government to do business respecting its own land with those with whom it has chosen to do business. With this taxing power exercised by the States the lessees might be ruined, the leases made of no value, and this law itself nullified.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would you be willing to permit the States to buy all of this Federal domain held by the Federal tenants and deny it to the many?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I understand what the feeling in the public-land States is. I know the feeling is that these States own or should be permitted to own all land, all property, and all resources within their borders now owned by the Federal Government. They resent the ownership and exercise of authority by the Federal Government over these lands, and they resist every attempt made by the Federal Government to get any profit out of the lands. Now, if we are going to take the position that the Federal Government should not own or continue to own these lands and these resources; that it should waive or transfer to the States all profits arising out of them; that we should withdraw our claims and give them up entirely to the States, just as these gentlemen have from time to time and at every opportunity insist shall be done, this section and this proviso is a step in that direction. But I insist, Mr. Chairman, that as the Government of the United States owns these lands it should claim and exercise control over them, and, pursuant to its rights, it is entitled to the reasonable revenue growing out of them. The States should not be permitted to enact laws that will embarrass the Government in its own use of its property or that will interfere with private parties to whom it grants rights or privileges. The States ought not to be permitted to enact laws, certainly ought not to be invited to enact laws, that will or might be so framed or so executed as to nullify everything the Federal Government undertakes to do with its property through these lessees. We should not pass a law like this, or with such a proviso as this, unless we are ready to go the limit and say that the Federal Government is prepared and willing now, or in the near future, as we may be forced toward that idea, to give up all of these lands and all natural resources in or a part of lands owned by the United States. That is the idea that prevails in the States; that is the demand the public-lands States are making. As I say, they oppose and resent the public-land policy so far pursued by the Government, and at every opportunity they encroach upon the rights of the Government respecting the use of and control over these properties. This proviso is a step in the direction of giving away Federal property and of surrendering control to the States. Unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is agreed to, the Government might be embarrassed in its effort to carry out the purposes of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan and Mr. BLANTON demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California, a member of the committee, offers an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from California, a member of the committee, is entitled to be recognized. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 71, between lines 21 and 22, insert as a new paragraph, to be known as section 32a, the following section:

"SEC. 32a. No stockholder of any corporation or any association engaged in commerce and producing or refining petroleum, or any of the by-products thereof, shall acquire or control, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of any other corporation or association so engaged, when both of such corporations or associations have been created or formed in compliance with a decree or judgment of dissolution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, or in avoidance of a prosecution previously initiated under the provisions of this act or the antitrust laws. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not less than six months."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. I make a point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon and the gentleman from Texas make a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order that it is not germane, either to the substitute or the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California wish to be heard?

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman completed his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. My point of order is that it is not germane to the subject brought in by the committee or the substitute relating to that subject.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this is not an amendment to the antitrust law. It does not propose to be. It does not propose to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints, and for other purposes," but it is a clear, clean amendment relating to the very subject involved in this bill. It relates to petroleum and refined oil and other products thereof. We have in the bill now all conditions, all restrictions, in regard to monopoly, in regard to those who can and can not hold a lease, and this provision just goes one step further and says that certain corporations named in the amendment can not participate in these proceedings or any part of them. I believe that the amendment is, for the reason stated, clearly in line as a part of the present bill before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The bill that the committee has under consideration is one to permit the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California provides that no stockholder of any corporation or any association engaged in commerce producing any of the commodities may acquire or control, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital of any other association or corporation. The gentleman's amendment deals with a totally different subject than the one dealt with in the bill. His amendment provides that no stockholder of any corporation engaged in commerce may acquire the stock of any corporation engaged in the production or sale of petroleum.

Mr. RAKER. Will the Chair yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill we have before us and which the gentleman seeks to amend is a bill upon a totally different subject.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the Chair's attention to the proceedings when the rule was adopted. I asked the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and the gentleman from Wyoming, and, while I did not put the question as to whether or not it would be germane, the rule provides that the discussion shall relate to the substitute.

A question was put to both gentlemen, and it is found on page 7507 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is whether any discussion on the matters in the Senate bill shall be germane. I did not use the word "germane," but I used the word "proper" for the purpose of discussion before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California answer this question to the Chair? What has the discussion which took place between the gentleman from California and these other gentlemen in the matter of a gentlemen's agreement got to do with the germaneness of the amendment that the gentleman from California is proposing to this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, let me submit one suggestion. One test of germaneness——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. RAKER. One moment. The Chair will hear me on this?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I read:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The substitute is the bill reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, that is res inter alios, so far as the Chairman is concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman's amendment. My point is that statements of some Member could not change a rule adopted by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly aware of that.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will be pleasant for a moment, that will be made clear. I am speaking to the Chair before he finally passes upon this objection to my amendment. I read:

Mr. RAKER. Is that intended to exclude any debate relating to the general Senate bill and all matters in relation to it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing this point of order. He is discussing the relevancy of general debate, which has nothing to do with it, and he is simply delaying the House.

Mr. RAKER. I am not delaying the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman ought to have an audience, and therefore I make the point of no quorum. The gentleman from California ought to have a good audience here to hear a good speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman from California is reaching the subject.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, relating to the subject and to the rule, I read:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule provides for the consideration of the House substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, on which I would like the Chair to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is decided affirmatively, but the Chair wishes to indulge the gentleman from California in order that he may learn if there is any new light to be thrown upon the point of order that is pending.

Mr. RAKER. That is the purpose of my discussion of the matter with the Chair. I read:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The general subject matter would be under consideration.

That is the statement of the gentleman who presented the rule to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This rule brings the substitute before the House as an original bill for the consideration of the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order, and ask for a ruling of the Chair on the point of order that I have raised. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained——

Mr. RAKER. Before you rule, Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. The Chair has given me a few minutes or a reasonable time in which to discuss the rule. I hope he will give me a few minutes. I am going right to the point. I can not be held responsible for the gentleman's obstruction of the proceedings of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed with the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Not at this time. I read further:

Mr. RAKER. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question in regard to his statement about the debate being confined to the subject of the bill. In section 1 the House has not included that provision in regard to alien ownership that the Senate has included.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that is inherent in this whole subject, and, of course, will be under consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to the specific language of the rule, which says—

That the reading of the Senate bill shall be dispensed with, and for the purpose of amendment the House committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill. That the substitute shall have a privileged status until the conclusion of its consideration, and the debate shall be confined to the substitute.

Now, the gentleman presenting the rule understood, and clearly the House understood, that any matter that was in relation to the original Senate bill would be considered by the House, by the Chairman, and would be proper to present before the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. How long can we discuss a rule after a ruling has been made by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. It is within the province of the Chair to determine.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. If the Chair is going to take up the time, I think there should be a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair does not recognize that as a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not completed his ruling when the gentleman from California rose and asked to be indulged for a further statement.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. A quorum is not present.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withhold his point. The Chair is indulging the gentleman from California for a minute on a point that will soon be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, should not the gentleman from Iowa withdraw his point of order before the Chair proceeds? I believe that he is pursuing dilatory tactics, but I think he ought to withdraw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman should know. He is a past master in the art. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is clearly germane to this bill—the language that is included in the Senate bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. DOWELL. The Chair certainly understands the point of order raised, beyond question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there are 103 Members here. That ought to be a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists on his point of order the Chair will count.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, could I have leave to go over to the office and do some real work? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be seated. Nothing can be done in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. And on that I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, not a sufficient number seconding the demand.

The motion of Mr. BLANTON was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred and four Members are present, a quorum. The Chair has heard all that he cares to hear on the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] was defeated, and it is possible that it would be just as well not to discuss it; but in view of the very extraordinary statements made by the gentleman from Michigan I think a brief statement should be made.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to make the point of order that the gentleman's discussion is not confined to his amendment, which is to strike out the last word. The last word is "States."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will discuss my amendment. The matter that I propose to discuss is the matter of taxation by the States. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to what the last word is.

Let us see what it is that we are proposing to do. Up to this time under this flag the Federal lands have been considered to be held by the Federal Government in trust for the future citizens of the States, and as the lands have passed into the hands of individuals they have been taxed to support the institutions of government, and they are taxed sufficient to support those institutions. Sometimes the tax rate in the West is enormously high in new sections, and must be in order to support the institutions of the State.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to do so, but I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing his amendment. He is discussing the question of taxation, which is not before the committee and is not in any paragraph now before the committee. It is wholly extraneous to the debate. I would not make this point of order but for the fact that the point of order was made a moment ago which prevented me from reading even a paragraph that pertained to the biggest subject in this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The last word of the section which the gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out is the word "States." The gentleman is discussing a matter relating to the States. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Clearly the States of the Union could not exist if the Federal Government could retain in public ownership untaxed all their lands and all their land values forever. They would die and perish from the earth.

Section 35 of this bill, following the provisions with regard to the other retained lands—those in the forest reserves—gives the States a certain portion of the revenues to partly reimburse them for their losses in taxes. That source, however, would not be sufficient to maintain the institutions of the State and of the communities, because these States not only tax the lands and their values, but they also tax the output of the lands. That is the law in practically every State to which this law applies. The provision which we have before us is one which recognizes the right of the States to tax their own citizens for the maintenance of the institutions of government. Gentlemen contest that right as though there were any question about it, as though communities could live without that right. How are we to support our schools, and how are we to build our roads, and how are we to maintain the institutions of government unless we have the right to tax? We reserve in that section the right to tax the output of these properties, just as we tax the output of like properties in private ownership, as in another part of the bill we provide for a distribution of the funds in order partly at least to reimburse the States for their losses of funds they would otherwise receive through taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 34. That the provisions of this act shall also apply to all deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas in the lands of the United States, which lands may have been or may be disposed of under laws reserving to the United States such deposits, with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, subject to such conditions as are or may hereafter be provided by such laws reserving such deposits.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-three Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON and Mr. SINNOTT moved that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Oregon both move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. On that motion I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SINNOT and Mr. BLANTON.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 99.

The CHAIRMAN. With the Chairman that makes 101 Members present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 35. That 10 per cent of all money received from sales, bonuses, royalties, and rentals under the provisions of this act, excepting those from Alaska, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts, 45 per cent of the amounts derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and 45 per cent of the amounts derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That all moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as "Miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SINNOTT offers the following amendment: Page 72, strike out line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 35. That 10 per cent of all money received, except from Alaska, from royalties (for oil or gas already produced, for past production, and on account of any division of proceeds of operation for past production), by virtue of the provisions of this act, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts, and 70 per cent of such royalties and such division of proceeds shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and 20 per cent of such royalties and such division of proceeds shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivision thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct. That 10 per cent of all other money received."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the subject of this bill reported by the committee under the rule, and that it brings in an entirely different subject providing that money derived from the administration of this bill shall go into a particular State in which it arose.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the Chair desire to hear me on the point of order as to germaneness?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is germane for the following reasons: The provisions of section 35 provide that a certain fund on hand at the present time, the result of past production, shall be divided 10 per cent to the Federal Government, 45 per cent to the reclamation fund, and 45 per cent to the States. I have changed those provisions so that 10 per cent, the same amount, will go to the Federal Treasury, but instead of 45 per cent going to the reclamation fund I allow 70 per cent to the reclamation fund, and instead of 45 per cent going to the States as provided in the original section, I provide that 20 per cent of such royalty shall go to the States. It is certainly germane; it simply changes the allotment for the past production.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman intend to strike out the balance of the section?

Mr. SINNOTT. For the present I leave the rest of the section in. All I change is line 11. That is the last line in my amendment. The original line 11 is "10 per cent of all money received." I change that and make it "10 per cent of all other moneys received." I merely divide the allotment of the past fund, the fund on hand at the present time. I am not interfering for the present with the future allotments. I think that would have to be taken up in a separate amendment.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's amendment is to dispose of past production?

Mr. SINNOTT. I dispose of for fund on hand as the result of past production. Ten per cent to the Government, 70 per cent to the reclamation fund, and 20 per cent to the States.

Mr. RAKER. There is no change in your amendment as to the remaining part of the section?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; but in order to make it harmonious and consistent, I insert before the word "money," in line 11, the word "other." My amendment takes up the very language of section 18 and the new section 18a, because I say from royalties, from the oil and gas already produced. That language is a part of section 18. Now that is the exact language taken from section 18.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman intend to offer a like division of the fund for the remaining part of the section if his amendment is agreed to?

Mr. SINNOTT. I want to get this disposed of first. The remainder is open to an amendment by myself or anyone else.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield as to a question on the point of order, but I want to get the point of order disposed of first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is germane, Mr. Chairman, because it provides for a division of the funds to the same beneficiaries as are mentioned in section 35. It seems to me that nothing can be more germane than this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. What does the gentleman from Oregon say to the fact that section 35 as reported from the Committee on Public Lands deals with royalties, rentals, and bonuses under leases yet to be made; whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon proposes to divide the funds that have accumulated and are now in the Treasury already received for oil, gas, and so forth?

Mr. SINNOTT. Let me explain. Perhaps the chairman does not understand the situation. If you will turn to section 18, page 54, you will find the following language:

And upon payment as royalty to the United States of an amount equal to the value at the time of production of one-eighth of all the oil or gas already produced,

Now, that relates to past production. Then on page 55 in the same section it says:

That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims.

The situation, Mr. Chairman, is this: A number of suits were started in California against oil claimants, and they are known as receivers' suits. In most of these suits a certain amount of money has been impounded that is not in the Treasury of the United States; it is in the custody of receivers. So also under an act of Congress the Secretary of the Interior entered into operation agreements with a number of these claimants. These men have been operating for a number of years. Under section 8 they will have to pay on account of past operations to the Secretary of the Interior one-eighth of the value of the production. Now, this is a fund that has been accumulating for which the operators must pay into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior one-eighth of the production. So section 35 relates to funds that will be received from both past and future production. My amendment relates solely to that coming from past production by virtue of sections 18, 18a, and 19.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that 90 per cent, if not all, of the money received from past production is out of naval reserves?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am not prepared to agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. What proportion of it is out of the naval reserves.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not know that that relates to this point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I think so. If we have any past production at all to handle, the amendment is certainly germane, and we certainly have.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, while I disagree very much with the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee and while I very much hope that the good judgment and candor of the House will vote it down, still I can not believe that any of us ought to ponder very long over the fact of whether or not it is germane. This leasing bill provides for the leasing of Government lands, and it must necessarily follow that the returns of royalties or rentals must naturally be dealt with in some way. The bill as reported by the committee proposes a certain distribution which, to my mind, is likewise a bad distribution. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has proposed a different distribution, which in my opinion is a bad disposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that the bill provides one method of distribution.

Mr. FERRIS. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. And that the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon provides a distinctly different one.

Mr. FERRIS. Not materially; only in amounts. For example, the bill as it stands provides that 10 per cent shall be used for administration, 45 per cent in the reclamation fund, and 45 per cent turned over to the States to be turned over to a lot of township boards and county commissioners to be expended by them direct. That is the bill as reported. I do not agree with the merits of that provision at all. I think it ought to be stricken out. The gentleman from Oregon offers another provision, and he provides that 10 per cent shall be used for administration, just as the original bill provides, but he provides that 70 per cent shall be paid into the reclamation fund instead of 45, and that 20 per cent shall be paid to these various States, in turn to be again distributed to township boards and county commissioners, instead of 45 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman realize that the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon tends to make a distribution of funds that are already accumulated?

Mr. FERRIS. True; but the original bill does the same thing. The original bill provides for the distribution not only of the $20,000,000 impounded funds, that are out there, but it likewise provides for the distribution of all succeeding funds that may accrue, so that in that respect the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon is not so dissimilar as to invade the rule of germaneness.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think I see where the Chair is possibly confused, and probably I confused the matter myself by my statement. We generally refer to these funds on hand as the funds that are going to be divided up. That will be the effect of it, but the theory of the bill is that irrespective of these funds, the oil operator must pay to the Secretary of the Interior one-eighth of the past production. The oil operator himself will naturally take that one-eighth out of the funds on hand, but we are not dividing up the funds that are on hand, and the oil operator will pay to the Secretary of the Interior one-eighth in full of the past production, and that is the real theory of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I fear that the chairman made an unfortunate statement in this. Of course, this bill does divide the pro rata parts that the Government gets, as I think it should.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; this one-eighth that is turned over to the Government is divided under section 35.

Mr. FERRIS. Exactly, but that has nothing to do with the seven-eighths that belongs to the oil operator.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, the only possible way the point of order could lie against the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon would be from the fact that perhaps this money did not come into the Treasury under the provisions of this act. As a matter of fact the moneys held in the Treasury now do not belong to anyone. One of the reasons for this bill is to settle a controversy as to whom the money belongs to, and by the provisions of this bill all of the money that the Government is holding in trust at the present time, or a portion of it, goes into the Treasury and it does not go into the Treasury unless this bill is passed, and it is under the provisions of this bill that the money does go into the Treasury that the Government is now holding in trust, both for the landowners and for the other parties. For that reason it is clearly germane for the gentleman to offer an amendment to make a new distribution of the proceeds.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair seems to be in doubt as to whether there is a difference between the money arising from past production of oil and gas and the moneys to be derived from future production, but if he will read the first line of section 35 he will see that it provides that all moneys received from any source under the provisions of this act shall be divided in a certain way. It can not be denied that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon is not adopted, and the bill remains as it is reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, all money derived from past production will be divided—10 per cent to the Treasury, 45 per cent to the reclamation fund, and 45 per cent to the States. There is no question but that section 35, as reported from the committee, divides the past production as well as the future production. Such being the case it is certainly in order for the gentleman from Oregon to divide this money into two classes; First, the money received for past production; and second, the money received for future production. The amendment is therefore clearly germane, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to this amendment, and I regret it is in order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain." Section 75 does not contain a word with regard to the disposition of a penny of money for past production. Section 35 deals only with money that will come into the Treasury through this promotion scheme. There is not a word, not a suggestion that there is any money in the Treasury that ought to be divided.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. We are not contending there is any money in the Treasury. Now, if you will turn to section 18 you will find out that for past production a royalty of one-eighth must be paid. So this royalty of one-eighth, when it is paid by the oil operator, which is for past production, is allotted under the provisions of section 35 to the Federal Government, the reclamation fund, and the State. So it is not money in the Treasury. These payments of the oil operators will be for past production in settlement of litigation and controversies.

Mr. GOOD. Unquestionably if the gentleman will strike out of the amendment the language "for oil or gas already produced, for past production," and again the language "division of the proceeds of operation for past production," then his amendment would be germane; but he says he offers it to this section, and it must be germane to the section. It is not germane to anything found in the section.

Mr. SINNOTT. Just a moment. The section divides up the funds——

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The language which I inserted in my amendment is taken verbatim et literatim from section 18. I used the identical language in section 18 and in section 18 (a), so there can be no confusion about the matter as to what funds I am referring to. If the gentleman will turn to section 18 he will find I have taken the identical language from section 18, referring to past production.

Mr. GOOD. What line?

Mr. SINNOTT. On page 54, lines 7 and 8, I use the words "already produced." Now, that relates to land not embraced in the naval reserve. If you will turn over to the next page, 55, you will find that the back payment or royalty for wells in the naval reserve is referred to in line 12 for past production; so I repeat "past production." Now, if you will turn to page 57, lines 6 and 7, where the President is authorized to make a settlement with the litigants upon a division of the land or division of proceeds of operation, I use that language, "division of the proceeds of operation." So I really take the formula from section 18 and section 18 (a) and incorporate it into this amendment to make it plain that I am referring to the moneys that are going to be paid for past production by the oil operator to the Secretary of the Interior in settlement of these suits and controversies.

Mr. GOOD. Now, where is this money for paying past production; and on account of the division of activities of proceeds of operation for past production, where is that money being paid now?

Mr. SINNOTT. Some of it has not been paid.

Mr. GOOD. Then it is not past production?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; some of it has been turned over to the Secretary of the Interior on operating contracts. Now he is holding that. Some of it is in the hands of receivers in courts of California, and some of it has not been accounted for at all, and the Government will have an accounting with the men who will owe the Government under this bill, and they will have to account for all past production before they can secure a settlement. It has not all been accounted and paid for by any means.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I am afraid this point of order has developed into a colloquy on the merits of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order, if gentlemen do not wish to be heard further.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to promote the mining of minerals on the public domain dealing with the future entirely. Then we bring into relation some money that has been earned in years past. This measure has been discussed for a good many years, and this section is in as plain language as you can get it. It was adopted in the Senate, and I feel that the amendment is clearly out of order to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that he is of the opinion that the bill deals entirely with royalties and bonuses and rentals to be received in the future under contracts to be entered into between the Government of the United States through the Secretary of the Interior and citizens of the United States or corporations. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon deals with revenues, either received by the United States in the past or turned over to some agency through which the United States may be able to receive the funds later, and seeks to divide the funds, either earned under previous contracts or turned into the Treasury——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the Chair permit me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The funds I am seeking to divide are the funds that will be paid by the oil operators under the provisions of this act in settlement of their controversy with the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The controversy with the Government is not involved in the act so far as the Chair can understand it. The act itself proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into leases, and provides the amount of compensation that shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States under the leases, and then provides how in this section it shall be divided between the States and the reclamation fund and the Treasury of the United States. Now, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] in his amendment does not disturb the division of the fund as proposed in section 35, funds to be received under leases to be made in the future, but what he does is that he seeks to inject another element into the section which does not deal with the subject that is pending at all, but deals with a subject that is not before us, and attempts to divide funds already received under contracts that are now in existence and are not provided for in the bill.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair be sustained as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes, 23.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment. I move to strike out section 35 and insert an amendment that was section 34 of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FERRIS: Strike out all of section 35 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 35. That all moneys received from sales, royalties, and rentals under the provisions of this act, excepting those from Alaska, shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, but after use thereof in the construction of reclamation works and upon return to the reclamation fund of any such moneys in the manner provided by the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, 50 per cent of the amounts derived from such royalties and rentals so utilized in and returned to the reclamation fund shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That any moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as 'Miscellaneous receipts.'"

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. FERRIS. The amendment is not subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it necessary to take any time on that.

Mr. Chairman, in 1902 Congress passed the reclamation act, which provided in terms clear and explicit that money received from the sale of public lands, minerals, and so forth, on the public domain should go into the reclamation fund, and there be created a revolving fund for the development of the West. This is the first instance where they have tried to invade that fund. Heretofore everyone has tried to keep that great national fund intact and in constant motion for the development of the West. Now, it comes to us to pass a bill here providing for the disposition of and the leasing of the minerals on the public lands of the United States, and it developed that there are $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 of money already impounded. The reason I do not give it exact is because some of it has to yet be calculated. The Department of Justice has some 36 suits already instituted, some tried and some yet to be tried. Large sums of money are involved. This legislation will help to settle it. This enables the Government to get its part. So one-eighth of this sum will immediately become the property of the Government after this bill has passed, and if that is put in the reclamation fund it will help that great national fund to keep alive. It will build it up and keep going. It will not allow it to be impoverished by taking the money for certain States, which would be to carve out the very heart of the reclamation fund. That ought not to be done. We should never begin that. I see here the chairman of the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. HUDSPETH. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask him how long this fund remains in the reclamation fund?

Mr. FERRIS. It is a revolving fund. After it has been used for a 10-year period for one reclamation project it is to be paid in and used for another project.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There seems to be a misconception here. I would like to say to my friend that when this fund is derived from the leases of public lands and goes into the reclamation fund it becomes a revolving fund?

Mr. FERRIS. If my amendment is agreed to, the money goes into the reclamation fund, where all the proceeds of sale of public lands go. And if the other amendment is agreed to part of the money goes to the States out West and later to a lot of boards of county commissioners, and so forth, and to that extent the fund will be depleted. I know the Members out West want the money to spend themselves; but it is not their money; it is Government money, and should go to the reclamation fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the law with regard to this revolving reclamation fund, any money that goes in there is for the entire benefit of the reclamation act, to be expended under no particular project, and under the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma it must be expended on projects in the particular State out of which it grew?

Mr. FERRIS. No. The amendment of the gentleman from Oregon does that. My amendment provides for putting every cent of it in the general reclamation fund, and that will keep alive the reclamation fund. That would probably put, with the one-eighth royalty, more than a million dollars into the reclamation fund immediately after the legislation is passed and the adjustments are made under it. By pursuing this course the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and his Appropriation Committee would be spared the act of appropriating a million dollars or more out of the Treasury of the United States to keep this great revolving fund alive.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand your amendment goes further and provides that eventually a proportion of this money shall be paid to the States?

Mr. FERRIS. It does, after the fund has been once expended for irrigation. Of course, if there be objection to that, it can be easily eliminated.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman state when any of these States, with any reasonable degree of certainty, would secure any of this money?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes. There is nothing new about this amendment. It has been drafted by the Interior Department. It has been passed through both Houses three times. It has always had the support of the Interior Department. This is an amendment to which this House has always agreed after very careful scrutiny. This new provision carried in this bill is a provision put in by the Senate, and it is a provision that has never met the approval of this House. This is an old story. This scheme has often been offered in the House, and always voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like a few minutes longer.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not make some arrangement as to how long this debate will last.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the chairman of the committee wait until I get through with my remarks? He can then fix it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, how much does the gentleman ask?

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Wyoming object?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not object.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. I have great respect for the gentleman's ability and a high opinion of his judgment. I would like to have his opinion. I think the gentleman is qualified to give it. When would the States be warranted reasonably to expect to get some of this money under this amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. As soon as it was paid back into the fund after using it once to reclaim the West. I do not claim any credit for my amendment. It is an amendment which this bill has carried for six years.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to ask the gentleman when will that be? Will it be 10 years or 20 years from now?

Mr. FERRIS. I think, from the way they have extended it, it will be 20 years, although one-twentieth of it will be paid in each year; so, of course, it will be coming in right along annually.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Twenty years might be the entire life of most of the oil wells in a given field.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no. One-twentieth of it will be paid in each year. It is a revolving fund anyway, and if it is properly safeguarded it will never get away.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. The real truth of it, Mr. Chairman, is I dislike very much to break with my friends from the West on this; I am very fond of all of them on both sides of the aisle; but last year they sprung this distribution of receipts to the limit, and the year before they pressed it to the limit, and the year before that, and now they go too far and cut too deep and take too much. They do more than that. They simply are not content to let the Government have anything to do with the proceeds of its own property.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FERRIS. Not now. I have fought so many battles for them on this floor and saved this item so many times that they ought to be content with enough and not ask to take too much. If the House gives them a liberal cut in Government funds to-day, they move on up to-morrow; there ought to be some modesty and some regard for the Government.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will it be necessary to identify these funds in the reclamation fund in order to get them?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no. They have got good bookkeepers there, and these vigorous county commissioners and township boards will get their share, you may be sure. No one need to have a care about that. Most of us fear they will get their share and the Government's also.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Why does the gentleman say it goes to the county commissioners? The bill says it is to be paid to the State.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, it is to be paid to the States or State legislatures and of course they will peddle it around among the counties.

Now, gentlemen, if these gentlemen will content themselves in patience I want to develop two or three more things. This Congress can not afford to undertake to cut the heart out of the Reclamation Service. This Congress can not afford to break down a great national system which in 1902 the Congress itself erected. This Congress can not afford to take a great national fund, a great national accretion, and divide it up among a lot of ambitious local communities, who want this Government money to carry out a lot of local schemes and have it spent immediately. You can not have the cake and eat it too, and you can not turn all this money over to local boards and local communities and still have a reclamation fund. No finespun argument will satisfy that. It is the simple truth.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I will wait until the gentleman is through.

Mr. FERRIS. This language that I have offered, I repeat, is exactly what we passed last year. It is exactly what we passed the year before. It is what we passed the year before exactly, and it was under very, very close scrutiny here.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FERRIS. In a moment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Fitzgerald] fought it, and contested it vigorously, and I helped to sustain the provision I am presenting here. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Sherley], later the head of the Committee on Appropriations, contested it vigorously, but the House again upheld it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], I assume, will be here contesting it this time. But the Members from the West, dear friends of mine that they are, ought not each year—after we have got an agreed state of facts, after we have agreed exactly with the Interior Department, and agreed with the House—depart from the agreement. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], the chairman of this Committee on Public Lands, will support the position I occupy. I am sure of that. He will support the amendment I have offered or one preciously near like it. I am sure of that, because I believe as chairman of the great Committee on Public Lands he will not care to begin to carve the heart from the reclamation fund. It is my belief that he will desire, as a credit to his chairmanship and as a credit to his administration of the Committee on Public Lands, to uphold it and make it stronger rather than break it down and make it weaker. This fund must not be dissipated here without realizing what we are doing at least.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. I desire to ask the gentleman upon what theory he will concede that the States are entitled to any of this money at any time?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me issue to the gentleman a little balm for his heart. In the section last passed there is a provision, very carefully placed in this bill, which provides for taxing this machinery and this output and these leases.

Mr. VAILE. But the gentleman is now proposing by this amendment that part of this fund shall ultimately go to the States. Upon what theory does the gentleman proceed to that?

Mr. FERRIS. On the theory of generosity, if it is to be done at all. It was a compromise provision. The theory I now propose is that this reclamation fund is depleted, that the reclamation fund is compelled to appeal to the Treasury every few years to get money to go forward. Now, here are $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 of Government money impounded, and that money ought to be used, at least some of it, for the purpose of building up the West. It ought to be used in a large way, and should not be scattered out and peddled out to a few local ambitious communities to the exclusion of all the rest.

Mr. VAILE. Why should the States ever have any of it on the gentleman's theory?

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will move to strike that out, he will get a good vote in the House. Will the gentleman vote to strike that out?

Mr. VAILE. No; I will not; and I will not vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. What does the gentleman mean. He erects a straw man here and then knocks him down. We have passed this bill over and over again. We passed it last year.

Mr. VAILE. I suppose the gentleman admits that the States are entitled to some of it at some time.

Mr. FERRIS. I supported that amendment before as a compromise. I was willing then, as a compromise, to donate part of the Government money to help out out there in the West, but there is no limit or stopping point.

Because on a compromise an honest division is made in order to get a lease law and go forward, does it now follow that all of the Government moneys must be given? I deny that any logic impels any such conclusion.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman is not at all fair when he states that we have passed this bill over and over again. His bill that we passed contained a provision that passed title to private owners of certain coal lands. It passed title to oil lands for a certain portion of the permit, whereas this bill does not pass title to any land.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is pretty close to the facts, but I will state them as they are. The bill last year provided that one-fourth of the lands in an oil prospector's permit, after oil was discovered, were to be given to the prospector as a reward for his discovery. This bill provides for a lease at a fixed minimum royalty of 5 per cent, which is full low, and gives a preference right for all the balance, which last year's bill did not give. That makes this bill more favorable to the oil man than last year's bill. I want the facts kept straight; I am sure the gentleman from Utah does also.

Mr. MAYS. What about the coal?

Mr. FERRIS. Last year's bill provided that the old coal law should remain intact, but everybody knew then, as they know now, that this leasing bill then passed effectually supplanted the coal law, so in actual effect there is no difference. There was no difference. This is only a move to get the money away from the Government quickly and keep it out of the reclamation fund altogether. I am perfectly sure this should not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk, which I wish to have read for the information of the House only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SNELL: Page 72, line 15, strike out the figures "45" and insert "60," and in line 19 strike out the figures "45" and insert "30."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this is one of the most important sections of this whole bill. I think it is one that the House should give very careful and considerate attention. My position in this matter is that we should not go to the extreme in either way; that we should recognize the fact that the States have lost the power to tax these lands, and they are entitled to a certain amount of this money in lieu of the taxation that would naturally come from these sources. Now, in the forest-reserve States the present law is that the States shall receive 25 per cent of the receipts and that 10 per cent shall go for the roads. That would give the States about 35 per cent. I have taken up this matter with the Interior Department, and they say that they feel that about the correct amount that the States should receive is in the vicinity of 30 per cent, and that would be about a fair distribution of the fund, and be just and equitable to both the States and the Federal Government, and that is what we want to do in a bill of this kind, and that is why I have offered my amendment. It is the fair, equitable, and right thing to do.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Did the gentleman present his views to the committee while this was being considered?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman is a member of the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's provision is for the payment to the States of their share of the funds immediately upon their collection?

Mr. SNELL. Immediately upon their collection, and that seems to be a fair provision, in accordance with the policy already established in the forest-reserve States.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman repeat his provision again?

Mr. SNELL. Ten per cent to the Federal Government, 30 per cent to the States, and 60 per cent to the reclamation fund. It seems to me this is fair to the States, and also that it protects the Government, and that is one thing we certainly should do. It seems to me it is an absolutely fair and equitable distribution of these funds. I intend to offer my amendment as a substitute for the one offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that by these States every year we are called upon to appropriate vast sums of money to build roads and trails. I assume that if this money goes into the State treasury that may be in lieu of all demands on the Federal Treasury to build those roads and trails in those States.

Mr. SNELL. I recognize the fact, and that is one reason why I voted against the provision in the original bill, the fact that the tendency is for the Federal Government to absorb all of the functions of the States, and if we are going to continue doing this we should protect the assets of the Federal Government; but I do feel that the State is entitled to a certain amount of these funds in lieu of taxation, and that my proposition is half way between what is in the bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and is the one that should be adopted.

Mr. SINNOTT. Has the gentleman offered his amendment?

Mr. SNELL. I can not offer it at this time, but I will when the time comes.

Mr. RAKER was recognized.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not arrange for closing debate on this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has been recognized.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield for the purpose of fixing the time.

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to see how much time is desired. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, is it the chairman's intention to finish this bill to-night?

Mr. SINNOTT. I hope so.

Mr. FERRIS. I doubt the advisability of having a lot of debate and then letting it go over until to-morrow, when Members will come in to vote upon it who never heard the debate. It ought to be voted on by Members who know something about it.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that amendments are to be offered? Is that a part of the request?

Mr. FERRIS. No.

Mr. MONDELL. There are likely to be substitutes offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma. Whether or not this is to be a debate on the section and all amendments thereto or simply on this amendment is a question I desire to ask.

Mr. FERRIS. Let us limit it to this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Substitutes are likely to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Oregon was that debate should close in one hour on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Does this apply to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SINNOTT. He has not offered the substitute yet.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to ask the chairman if it is his intention to vote on this to-night?

Mr. SINNOTT. I hope we shall.

Mr. FERRIS. If we can not vote to-night, I do not want to agree to limit debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if this matter can be disposed of to-night. I think that when Members vote on the amendments they ought to have heard the debate, and I suggest to the chairman that he might as well move that the committee rise and take the matter up Thursday morning.

Mr. FERRIS. May I make a suggestion to the majority leader that we have an hour to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MONDELL. I have tried to make an arrangement with the committee that will occupy the time on Calendar Wednesday, but they desire the entire day. I am afraid it will be impossible to make that arrangement, but we can take the matter up Thursday morning. Before the committee rises, in view of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is not going to be here on Thursday, I understand he wants to offer his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. SNELL. I will offer it as a substitute.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor, and I only yielded to the gentleman from Oregon to fix the time.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from California will have his time when we next take up the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York to offer his amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered my amendment to strike out the section and insert a new section. Now, what is it the gentleman from New York proposes?

Mr. MAYS. He seeks to perfect the section.

Mr. FERRIS. He does not say so.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is offered to perfect the text.

Mr. SNELL. My amendment is a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for the introduction of his amendment, unless there be objection, as a perfecting amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I would have that right anyway, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] as a substitute for the section would be in order.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman from New York propose to perfect my amendment or the original text?

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed to perfect the original text. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SNELL: Page 72, line 15, strike out the figures "45" and insert "60"; line 19, page 72, strike out the figures "45" and insert "30."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer that in the time of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], as he yields for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be considered as pending.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] desires to use his time now I shall move to rise.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2775 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9782. An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 29, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill providing for the relief of Capt. J. S. Carpenter, United States Navy (H. Doc. No. 280); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting list of publications received and distributed from the office of the Secretary of the Navy during the fiscal year 1918–19 (H. Doc. No. 281); to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8028) to reserve as parts of the Oregon, Siuslaw, and Crater National Forests in Oregon certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co., against the United States, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 425), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 427), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

DISPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED VESSELS (S. DOC. NO. 146).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting information in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, which will be printed and also printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, October 28, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I beg to submit reply of the United States Shipping Board to Senate resolution 212:

1. Whether any effort was made to sell tankers to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co., and, if so, what prices were offered and asked for the same.

Answer. The correspondence, beginning May 9, 1919, together with the action of the board, is submitted herewith. No price appears to have been offered by the company for the tankers. In letter of May 9 inquiry was made re the purchase of five or seven of the largest tank steamers at prices to be agreed upon. May 24 the board referred the matter to the Director of the Division of Operations and the Director of the Division of Planning and Statistics for review and recommendation. The latter, May 29, recommended the sale if the price could be agreed upon. Mr. Rosseter, Director of the Division of Operations, June 4, recommended the sale of five tankers, naming them, stating: "While it appears that these vessels are estimated to cost us from $255 to $328 per ton, it seems to me that a fair selling price might be $250, as we could probably replace under new contracts at $210, possibly $200 per ton." On June 16 the board passed a resolution offering the tankers at $250 per dead-weight ton. On July 21 John E. Barber, head of the sales division, reported as follows: "Mr. Nichols, president of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co., says that he is still in the market for tankers, but not at our price. His idea of price seems unreasonably low, so I think you may consider that he is not a good prospect." The files do not show any suggested price.

2. What number of ships have been disposed of to private interests, with a description of same and prices received?

Answer. Herewith (Exhibit A) is a copy of a report giving in detail all sales completed to October 20, 1919, date, price, name of purchaser, description of ship, amount paid in cash, and amount of payment deferred, covering a total of 176 ships; sales value, $125,540,993; payment actually received, $12,337,609.26. Embraced in this list are 160 steel Lake-type vessels, contracted to be sold to Anderson Overseas Corporation at $210 per dead-weight ton. This transaction has not actually been consummated, and no payment has been made on account thereof.

The cash payment required to be made is included in the column "Initial payment," under "Recapitulation of ship sales"; but the column "Received from sales consummated, $12,337,609.26," represents the money actually paid in. Since October 20 eight additional ships have been sold, described in Exhibit B attached. Three are new steamers, sold at our regular prices; two are reconditioned Lake steamers, sold "as is"; and one is a very old wooden cargo steamer. Two are requisitioned ships redelivered to the owner, who refunded our total investment with interest.

3. Whether any offers have recently been received or are at present pending and the quotations involved?

Answer. The prospective sales now under consideration, with prices and terms proposed, are shown on Exhibit C attached hereto.

4. What policy is being followed in endeavoring to dispose of ships?

Answer. So far as the sale of the tankers is concerned, in view of the large number of coal-burning cargo ships now in use, it is not deemed wise to sell desirable tankers. The tanker situation is shown in the letter dated October 7 from tank-steamer executive, Capt. Paul Foley, attached hereto as Exhibit D.

As to the sale of cargo steamers, a sales organization is maintained and all reasonable efforts made to effect such sales at the prices and terms indicated on Exhibit E, submitted herewith. It has not been deemed wise to cut prices or to materially change the terms.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN BARTON PAYNE, Chairman.

Hon. GEORGE A. SANDERSON,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
SHIP SALES DIVISION,
New York City, July 21, 1919.

Mr. JOHN J. FLAHERTY,
Assistant Secretary United States Shipping Board,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLAHERTY: Answering your inquiry of July 16, Mr. Nichols, president of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co., says that he is still in the market for tankers, but not at our price. His idea of price seems unreasonably low, so I think you may consider that he is not a good prospect.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN E. BARBER,
Vice President United States Shipping Board
Emergency Fleet Corporation.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from John E. Barber, vice president United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, to John J. Flaherty, assistant secretary United States Shipping Board, dated July 21, 1919.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
SHIP SALES DIVISION,
New York City, July 17, 1919.

Mr. JOHN J. FLAHERTY,
Assistant Secretary United States Shipping Board,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your letter of July 16; the president of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines is out of town until Monday, when I shall report back to you the present status of negotiations for the sale of five tank steamers.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN E. BARBER,
Vice President United States Shipping Board
Emergency Fleet Corporation.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from John E. Barber, vice president United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, to John J. Flaherty, assistant secretary United States Shipping Board, dated July 17, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, July 16, 1919.

Mr. J. E. BARBER,
Vice President Emergency Fleet Corporation,
Ship Sales Department, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Referring to resolution adopted by the board on June 16, providing that negotiations for the sale of five tank steamers be entered into with the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, please advise the present status of this case.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. FLAHERTY,
Assistant Secretary.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from Assistant Secretary John J. Flaherty to J. E. Barber, vice president Emergency Fleet Corporation, under date of July 16, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

EXTRACT FROM PROCEEDINGS OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Date: June 16, 1919.
Docket No. 865 At 6.
Subject: Sale of tankers to Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines.

Consideration was given to a communication received from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, dated May 9, 1919, submitting a proposal to purchase or charter tank steamers now under construction for this board by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. This matter was discussed at a meeting of the board on May 24, and after consideration it was ordered that the matter be referred to the Divisions of Operations and Planning and Statistics, respectively, for recommendations. Mr. Tower, of the Division of Planning and Statistics recommended that:

(1) The tank-steamer traffic is a special trade, which has long been dominated by a few companies interested in the oil business.

(2) The tankers being constructed by the Shipping Board are necessarily high priced because of the effect of war conditions on contracts.

(3) According to reliable information, British tankers have recently been offered at a charter rate considerably below what would be a paying figure for tankers built at the Shipping Board price.

(4) Unless the Shipping Board can operate or charter to private operators tankers on the basis equal to that prevailing for British vessels of the same class, it seems desirable to dispose of Shipping Board tankers whenever opportunity offers.

(5) The company involved in this request, together with its subsidiary lines, represents what is currently reported to be one of the strongest United States shipping concerns, and it seems desirable to strengthen wherever possible such interests for the ultimate benefit of our merchant marine.

Director of Operations Rosseter, in memorandum of June 13, recommended that, if a proper price can be obtained, the board sell to the said Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines five tank steamers. It was the sense of the meeting that the tank steamers should be sold instead of chartered, and that an effort should be made to obtain a price of $250 per dead-weight ton. On motion of Commissioner Donald, seconded by Commissioner Robinson, and duly carried, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That negotiations for the sale of five tank steamers be entered into with the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, and that an effort be made to obtain $250 per deadweight ton for these steamers.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of an extract from proceedings of the United States Shipping Board, dated June 16, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION,
DIVISION OF OPERATIONS,
Washington, June 13, 1919.

Memorandum for Mr. Flaherty, assistant secretary: Sale of tankers:

Replying to yours of June 6, referring to your memorandum of May 27 relative to application of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines for purchase or charter of tank steamers.

I am of the opinion that it is desirable, if a proper price can be obtained, to sell to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines five tank steamers as against their application for seven tank steamers. Their proposal contemplates that these tankers will be used in transporting fuel for use of steamers of their subsidiary companies and our facilitating them in securing tonnage to so supply steamers in which they are interested results in the strengthening of our merchant marine.

As information, I might state that this division proposes recommending priority in the assignment or charter of tankers to oil companies having contracts to supply fuel for Shipping Board vessels, as also supplies required by the Navy Department.

J. H. ROSSETER,
Director of Operations.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from J. H. Rosseter to Mr. Flaherty, assistant secretary, under date of June 13, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, June 6, 1919.

Memorandum for Mr. Rosseter:

Reference is made to my memorandum dated May 27, 1919, quoting extract from the minutes of the meeting of the Shipping Board held on May 24, 1919, advising you that a letter from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines offering to purchase or charter tank steamers now under construction by the Emergency Fleet Corporation was ordered referred to you and to the director of the division of planning and statistics for review and recommendation.

Director Tower, of the division of planning and statistics, under date of May 29, 1919, has submitted his recommendation in this matter that the Shipping Board sell to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines such five or seven tank steamers as that company may wish to purchase.

Copy of Mr. Tower's communication is transmitted for your information.

Will you kindly give this matter your immediate attention and prepare a statement for presentation to the board, stating your opinion of the proposition made by the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, and whether Mr. Tower's recommendations meet with your approval.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY,
Assistant Secretary.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a memorandum from Assistant Secretary Flaherty to Mr. Rosseter, under date of June 6, 1919.

Washington, June 4, 1919.

Mr. E. N. HURLEY, Chairman:

With reference to attached letter addressed to you by Mr. H. H. Raymond, and copy of letter from Mr. A. R. Nicol, president of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines:

I am in favor of selling five of our tankers now under construction, and would suggest the following:

Caboille (8,500), ready promptly, Wilmington.
Dame Daike (6,000), ready in September, Baltimore.
Derby Line (10,100), ready promptly, Alameda.
Hoxbar (10,100), ready promptly, Wilmington.
Romulus (7,500), ready in July, Wilmington.

As to price.—While it appears that these vessels are estimated to cost us from $255 (Caboille) to $328 (Dame Daike) per ton, it seems to me that a fair selling price might be $250, as we could probably replace under new contracts at $210, possibly $200, per ton.

I might add that we have already chartered one of our tankers, the Hugoton, to the Standard Oil Co. of New York at $6.50 per ton per month for the balance of the year.

J. H. ROSSETER,
Director of Operations.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from Mr. J. H. Rosseter to Mr. E. N. Hurley dated June 4, 1919.

[SEAL.] JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, May 29, 1919.

To: Chairman E. N. Hurley, Commissioner.
From: Mr. Walter S. Tower.
Subject: Recommendation concerning request from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines for tankers.

According to the minutes of the United States Shipping Board for May 24, a recommendation is requested concerning the proposal from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines to purchase, charter, or manage tank steamers now under construction by the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

I recommend that, if possible to agree upon a satisfactory price, the Shipping Board sell to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines such five or seven tank steamers as that company may wish to purchase.

My reasons for this recommendation are as follows:

(1) The tank-steamer traffic is a special trade which has long been dominated by a few companies interested in the oil business.

(2) The tankers being constructed by the Shipping Board are necessarily high-priced because of the effect of war conditions on contracts.

(3) According to reliable information, British tankers have recently been offered at a charter rate considerably below what would be a paying figure for tankers built at the Shipping Board price.

(4) Unless the Shipping Board can operate or charter to private operators tankers on the basis equal to that prevailing for British vessels of the same class, it seems desirable to dispose of Shipping Board tankers whenever opportunity offers.

(5) The company involved in this request, together with its subsidiary lines, represents what is currently reported to be one of the strongest United States shipping concerns, and it seems desirable to strengthen, wherever possible, such interests for the ultimate benefit of our merchant marine.

DIVISION OF PLANNING AND STATISTICS,
By WALTER S. TOWER, Director.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter dated May 29, 1919, from Walter S. Tower to Chairman E. N. Hurley.

EXTRACT FROM PROCEEDINGS OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Date, May 24, 1919.
Docket No. 865A16.
Subject: Application of Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines to purchase or charter tank steamers.

There was presented a letter from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, dated May 9, 1919, offering to purchase tank steamers now under construtcion by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, or, if the sale can not be arranged, offering to charter five or seven tank steamers from the board on time charters with an option to purchase, and, if neither arrangement could be made in the near future, applying for the assignment to them for management and operation of a number of tank steamers until such time as arrangements can be made for their acquiring tank steamers by purchase or charter. This company owns oil-producing wells in Mexico, and is in need of tanker tonnage to move fuel for the use of steamers of its subsidiary companies—the Clyde Line, Mallory Line, New York and Porto Rico Line, Ward Line, and the Southern Line. It was ordered that the matter be referred to the director of operations and the director of the division of planning and statistics for review and recommendation.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of an extract from proceedings of the United States Shipping Board dated May 24, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.
NEW YORK, May 9, 1919.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Our company, through its subsidiaries, is the owner of oil-producing wells in Mexico, to move the products of which we require tank steamers, and we are also in need of tanker tonnage to move fuel for the use of steamers of our subsidiary companies—the Clyde Line, Mallory Line, New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co., Ward Line, and Southern Steamship Co.

To meet these needs we respectfully request the Shipping Board—

(1) To sell to our company five or seven of the largest tank steamers now building, of the highest class and speed, at prices that may be agreed on.

(2) If present sale can not be arranged, to charter to this company five or seven of such tank steamers, on time charters, with an option to purchase, or, if no such option can be given, without any option on terms which may be agreed.

(3) If neither sales nor charters can be made in the near future, that the board will allocate to our company for management and operation, until such time as arrangements can be made by which we can either purchase or charter them, five or seven of such tank steamers.

This company is anxious to purchase tank tonnage of the quantity above indicated at the earliest practicable time, and presents the alternative requests of charter and allocation for management only upon condition that purchases can not be arranged at present.

The sale of this tanker tonnage to our company would insure its remaining permanently under the American flag.

Very truly, yours,

A. R. NICOL, President.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of letter from A. R. Nicol to the United States Shipping Board, dated May 9, 1919.

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

CLYDE STEAMSHIP CO.,
New York, May 12, 1919.

Mr. EDWARD H. HURLEY,
Chairman United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HURLEY: With reference to our talk on Friday last regarding tankers, please find herewith copy of official letter from Mr. A. R. Nicol, president of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, which speaks for itself. I trust you will take this matter under favorable consideration and appoint a time when we can discuss the matter with a view of obtaining tankers on some basis that may be mutually satisfactory.

With cordial personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly, H. H. RAYMOND.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a letter from H. H. Raymond to Mr. Edward H. Hurley, dated May 12, 1919.

EXHIBIT D.

OCTOBER 7, 1919.

From: Tank steamer executive, Customhouse, New York City.
To: Director of Operations, United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Shipping Board policy with regard to tank steamers.

There is submitted herewith a study of the combined tank-tonnage requirements of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and of the United States Navy Department balanced at selected dates against the tonnage necessary to meet the bunkering requirements at home and abroad of oil-burning vessels other than tankers under the American flag, including those of the United States Navy Department.

The purpose in view has been to reach conclusions of value as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the present tanker program and to deduce therefrom the correct policy with regard to the disposal of tank steamers. The interests of the Navy Department and the United States Shipping Board are too closely interlocked to permit consideration of the tank-tonnage position of one apart from that of the other, and if the American merchant marine is to be in fact independent of foreign control as regards bunkering requirements of privately owned vessels under the American flag must be considered in conjunction with those of the Government.

The general position as of date January 1, 1920 and 1921, and August 1, 1921, is as follows:

	Aug. 1, 1919–Jan. 1, 1920.	Jan. 1, 1920–June 1, 1921.	June 1, 1921–Aug. 1, 1921.
	Dead-weight tons.	Dead-weight tons.	Dead-weight tons.
1. American flag oil-burning tonnage in service (excluding tankers):
(a) Owned by Shipping Board	4,504,585	7,374,300	7,635,875
(b) Privately owned (as of August, 1919)	1,006,778	1,006,778	1,006,778
(c) Navy
In all	5,511,363	8,381,078	8,642,653
2. Fuel-oil requirements:	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
(a) Shipping Board	1,329,866	5,723,765	4,179,536
(b) Privately owned vessels	594,233	1,356,696	817,425
(c) Navy	590,000	1,416,000	826,000
In all	2,514,099	8,496,461	5,822,961
3. Tank tonnage to move:	Dead-weight tons.	Dead-weight tons.	Dead-weight tons.
(a) For Shipping Board tonnage	306,322	556,328	695,628
(b) For privately owned tonnage	127,186	129,914	123,840
(c) Navy	200,000	300,000	300,000
In all	633,508	986,242	1,119,468
4. Tank tonnage available:
(a) Owned and controlled by Shipping Board	481,181	742,581	820,581
(b) Owned and controlled by Navy	99,500	195,350	195,350
In all	580,681	937,931	1,015,931
5. Surplus of tonnage above Government requirements only	74,359	81,603	20,303
6. Deficit of Government tank tonnage against requirements of Government and merchant marine	52,827	48,311	103,537

The assumptions and data upon which the above figures are based are fully set forth in the inclosures which are attached to this letter and form a part of this study. As it has been impossible at this time to determine the increased fuel-oil requirements resulting from the proposed conversion of the German passenger tonnage to oil, or other conversions to oil burners, and for increases in the privately owned American tonnage, which is assumed as constant as of August 1, 1919, the tank-tonnage deficit herein reported must be regarded as a minimum estimate.

On the assumption that the view advanced herein, that the primary mission of the Government-owned tank tonnage is to meet the bunkering requirements of the American merchant marine and the Navy, will be approved by the board and become an integral part of the permanent policy of the board, it is recommended—

1. That no tank steamers of the contract type be sold and that no tankers obtained by requisition of foreign contracts be reconveyed or sold or otherwise passed from ownership and control of the Shipping Board.

2. That tonnage to cover the estimated deficit of tank tonnage against the requirements of the Government and other vessels of the merchant marine as of August 1, 1921, amounting to 103,537 dead-weight tons, be reinstated from the suspended program.

3. That the American claimants of tank steamers, contracts of which were requisitioned by the Shipping Board, be required to accept or reject reconveyance of these vessels by January 1, 1920.

4. That tank tonnage, which may hereafter be reconveyed to claimants, be replaced by the construction of a like amount of tank tonnage.

5. That additional tank tonnage be provided to meet the fuel-oil requirements which arise from the conversion of seized German tonnage from coal to an oil-burning basis, estimated at 50,000 dead-weight tons.

Very truly, yours,

PAUL FOLEY,
Tank Steamer Executive.

AUGUST 27, 1919.

STANDARD FORM OF PURCHASE AGREEMENT AND MORTGAGE.

1. Steel cargo vessels are sold at a base price of from $200 to $230 per dead-weight ton, subject to a cash discount of 2 per cent. The dead-weight tonnage is taken from our records with full opportunity of the proposed buyer to verify these figures. Fifty thousand dollars is deposited as earnest money with each offer, which is returned if the board rejects the offer but which constitutes liquidated damage in case the buyer refuses to proceed with the purchase. If delivery of the vessel is delayed beyond the closing date as fixed in the agreement, the buyer may cancel the contract or may go on with it.

2. Under the deferred-payment plan 25 per cent is paid upon delivery of the vessel, 25 per cent is paid in semiannual installments during the first year thereafter and the remaining 50 per cent is paid in four years more in semiannual installments of 6¼ per cent each. Deferred payments bear interest at 5 per cent.

3. The buyer pays the cost of wireless equipment and all engine-room stewards and other stores at market value based upon master's inventory.

4. We deliver a certificate of a classification society showing the maintenance of classification of the vessel but make no warranty of the condition of the vessel nor guaranty of capacity.

5. The buyer must maintain insurance of 25 per cent more than the unpaid purchase price covering all marine, fire, and other risks usually covered, also war-risk and P. and I. insurance; policies and underwriters approved by the board; policies to be delivered to the board and payable to the board as its interest may appear. An option in the board to require such insurance to be carried in its own insurance fund.

6. All liens and attachments to be removed or bonded within 30 days.

7. The buyer will maintain the classification of the vessel and furnish annually a certificate of maintenance of class and keep the vessel in prime condition, ordinary wear and tear and depreciation excepted.

8. The buyer will not impair any insurance nor engage in extra-hazardous journeys, nor operate the vessel contrary to rules that may be adopted by the board. The board has the right to inspect the vessel, cargo, and ship's papers and also the financial records of the buyer and may place its representative aboard.

9. The purchase agreement constitutes a part of the ship's papers and the vessel to carry the words "United States Shipping Board mortgagee" so as to preclude liens superior to the mortgage interest.

10. The buyer will pay all taxes, charges, and fines imposed upon the vessel or her income.

11. The board may take care of insurance, liens, etc., and charge the same against the buyer, with 6 per cent interest.

12. The board reserves the right to control the issue of securities and the declaration of dividends, except 7 per cent upon cash actually invested. However, when 50 per cent of the boat has been paid and the buyer has at all times 12½ per cent of the purchase price of the boat in liquid assets, the buyer may declare such dividends as will not impair such liquid assets.

13. The board may require the buyer to form a separate corporation for the vessels sold under the purchase agreement and the buyer will not transfer or mortgage its interest in the vessel without the consent of the board.

14. The buyer agrees to execute such further papers as counsel for the board may require.

15. Mortgage.—The mortgage is of the vessel and her earnings and all additions, improvements, and replacements thereon and secures the deferred payments and all other sums due under the purchase agreement, and provides that if default be made in any payment or in the performance of any condition in the purchase agreement, or if the buyer becomes insolvent, the board may—

(a) Declare all the deferred payments immediately due.

(b) Recover judgment against the buyer.

(c) Retake the vessel wherever found and resell or charter or operate the same.

(d) Retake the vessel and sell by public advertisement.

(e) Place a receiver or a custodian or a representative in the business office of the buyer.

16. In case of default the buyer agrees, at his own expense, to redeliver the vessel to the board, but the board has the right to retake the same wherever found. The several powers under the mortgage may be exercised at one time or serially without affecting the right to exercise other powers. The buyer may cure any default within 15 days, after which time it is optional with the board whether to accept the curing of a default.

17. All moneys received from a retaking and resale or charter or use of the boat will apply first to the payment of expenses and then to liquidate the indebtedness to the board, and the balance to the buyer.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 145).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting in response to a resolution of the 24th instant certain information relative to a purported public statement issued by the commission in reference to Senator JAMES E. WATSON, of Indiana, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 8272. An act to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry; and

H. R. 9782. An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented resolutions adopted by Friends of Irish Freedom of Detroit, Mich., favoring the independence of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Upper Peninsula Educational Association, of Marquette, Mich., extending thanks for the downfall of autocracy and the cessation of hostilities and urging support of the league of nations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Michigan State Federation of Labor, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the retirement of superannuated and disabled employees of the Government, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Michigan State Federation of Labor, favoring an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Hannon-Colvin Post, No. 180, American Legion, of Hudson, Mich., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the war-risk insurance act, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ELKINS presented memorials of Local Lodge No. 65, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America; of Local Division No. 190, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and of Local Lodge No. 104, International Association of Mechanics, all of Huntington, in the State of West Virginia, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill to further regulate commerce, etc., which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Commerce of Parkersburg, W. Va., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation requiring cost price to be placed on goods sold in retail trade, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMERENE (for Mr. CUMMINS), from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3319) to provide for the reimbursement of the United States for motive power, cars, and other equipment ordered for railroads and systems of transportation under Federal control, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 280) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3322) granting a pension to Philippine Petersen; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 3323) granting a pension to Jonathan D. Richardson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 3324) granting a pension to Bernard Higgins; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3325) granting an increase of pension to Leonard D. Spann (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3326) granting a pension to Ruth E. Hartfiel (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3327) granting certain rights of way and exchanges of the same across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 3328) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to certify certain findings of fact, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROAD STATISTICS.

Mr. McCORMICK. I offer the following resolution and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read it, without objection.

The resolution (S. Res. 222) was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to investigate and report to the Senate the facts in connection with the present or prospective ownership or control by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, either directly or through the ownership and control of the stocks of any corporation or company, of any line or lines of railway or part thereof, situate within the territory of the United States, together with a statement of the mileage of said railroads.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 223), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Commerce Committee of the Senate a statement covering the operation of ships under its control, showing the number, tonnage, and character, by groups, of the ships operated directly or leased or chartered by the board; the cost, including overhead, of operation; the gross earnings; and the net revenue or income and earnings; the losses suffered, including damages; the depreciation, estimated; and all factors to be considered in determining what has been the experience in operating the ships.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I offer an amendment to the covenant of the league of nations, and ask that it be read. I offer it in the form of an amendment because I have not yet been able to frame a reservation to accomplish the same object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend article 12 of the covenant of the league of nations by inserting after the words "they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council" the following language: "and not then until an advisory vote of the people shall have been taken."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to democratize war. The object of the amendment is to give the boys who have to bleed and die and to give the fathers and mothers of the boys who have to bleed and die, as well as others who have to bear the burdens, the privilege of at least an advisory vote as to the necessity, as to the desirability of a proposed war. This will help to take the power of plunging a nation into war out of the hands of kings and emperors and czars. It will promote peace and tend to prevent war. This is my sole, my supreme object.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram relating to the league of nations.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CADDO MILLS, TEX., October 17, 1919.

Senator SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

We desire to express through you our thanks and appreciation for the votes of 55 Senators yesterday. Hope other amendments will meet same fate and that you may be able to close the bitter debate on the peace treaty and hasten its ratification. We feel that our Government should hold first place in the affairs of the world—the place won on the battle fields of the war by our boys.

C. F. Stevensons, C. B. Briscoe, J. E. Johnson, W. S. Grimes, E. L. Foster, W. C. Stell, J. M. Hanchey, J. A. Harper, Jas. R. Bass, G. W. Williams, W. E. Drake (and others).

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article taken from the Columbia (S. C.) State relative to the result if the Senate should fail to confirm the pending treaty of peace with Germany.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"IF THE TREATY FAILS.

"The Columbia (S. C.) State sums up compactly in the following the result if the Senate should fail to confirm the treaty:

"WHERE SHOULD WE STAND?

"If the partisans, under the mad leadership or counsel of Senators LODGE, KNOX, BORAH, JOHNSON of California, and REED, succeed in assassinating the treaty of peace, where should we stand? What would be the status of this country among the great powers of the world—its late compeers in the war for humanity?

"There are at least two rather gruesome possibilities. We should either have to declare a state of peace by some such undignified device as a senatorial resolution or we should have to go 'hat in hand'—Senator LODGE's apt phrase—to solicit peace from Berlin or Weimar.

"Either horn of the dilemma would gore us terribly.

"If we were forced to sue for peace, we could not, of course, expect to get anything like the terms that we should get under the treaty of Versailles, which was a dictated peace. We should have to dicker about commercial matters and political rights of Germans in this country and many other unpleasant things, and we should, of course, lose whatever we stand under the treaty to gain in the way of reparations and restitutions.

"If, on the other hand, we should content ourselves, like our friend and guide, China, with a 'peace by resolution' of the Senate, we should forego everything we have gained, even much of the honor of fighting and greatly helping to win the war.

"In either case we should have to return the German ships and all German property seized by us in reimbursement of expenditures made necessary by the war. We should abandon all hope of getting any of the ships we are now claiming, even against the protest of Great Britain and in defiance of the supreme council.

"We should be simply restoring, as far as it may be restored, the status of 1917, before we entered the war—with the Lusitania and its dead and other losses of life and treasure uncompensated for in any way.

"We should lose even the honor and the gratification of taking a manly and our due share in the reconstruction work of the shattered world.

"What do these partisans offer us in exchange for all these losses, these immeasurable sacrifices, this shameful retreat?"

THREATENED STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, a statement of the Colorado and New Mexico Coal Operators' Association regarding the effect of the proposed coal strike upon the industry in that section of the United States.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., October 25, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Supplementing our wire of October 21, we submit herewith a statement issued by the Colorado and New Mexico Coal Operators' Association setting forth the present scale of wages and what the workmen demand.

This we consider a concise statement of the present situation from the standpoint of the operators, and would appreciate your reading same carefully.

Yours, truly,

THE DENVER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
By L. R. LEWIS, Business Manager.

"STATEMENT BY THE COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION CONCERNING IMPENDING COAL STRIKE.

"To dealers in and consumers of bituminous coal:

"The press dispatches from Washington, October 17, quote Mr. John L. Lewis, who is the acting president of the United Mine Workers of America (the National Coal Miners' Union), as saying:

"The Government can not stop the threatened strike of coal miners."

"Interviews by press correspondents a few days ago also quote Mr. Lewis as saying he has sent out a call to all the local unions at bituminous mines throughout the Nation directing them and their associate workers to strike on November 1 next. This is carrying out the threat of the union to shut down every bituminous coal mine in the country unless the coal operators accept and accede to the demands of the union without question or modification.

"The effect of this is to punish the bituminous coal consumers of the entire Nation as well as all of the bituminous coal operators in the country because the demands made upon a limited number of operators in the Eastern and Middle States are not or can not be granted. And it has come to the place now where, according to the statement of Mr. Lewis, even the Government itself can not prevent the calamity of a nation-wide strike at the very outset of winter.

"In view of the seriousness of this situation it is not only perfectly proper but desirable that as far as we are able we should place before you, and as briefly as we can, the facts within our knowledge, so you may know and be able to explain to those who are depending upon you why you and they may be unable to secure a supply of fuel after the 1st of November.

"The recent conference between coal operators and the union was made up of employers and employees in what is known as the central competitive field (western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois), and while Colorado, New Mexico, and other western mines were not represented at that conference in times past, changes made in the central competitive field in either wages or hours of work were likewise granted by all mining districts outside of the central competitive field.

"Briefly stated, the demands of the union are: (1) An increase of 60 per cent of the present wages paid for day labor and for piecework at the mines; (2) in addition to the money increase in day wages and piecework, that the time worked by the mines shall be reduced to six hours daily and that the mines shall not work more than five days per week except in emergencies, and for emergency work there shall be paid time and a half for overtime and double wages for work done on holidays and Sundays, Saturday to be regarded as a holiday; (3) that mines shall not be worked double shift except in emergencies; (4) that miners violating their contract shall not be required to pay any penalty whatever, as is now the case; (5) that in event the coal operators do not accept all of the demands made by the union a strike shall be called on November 1.

"We only recite the major demands made by the union; the others are omitted for the sake of brevity.

"To the demands made the operators replied, after conference, that the demands are radical, extravagant, and manifestly impossible of acceptance; that the demands indicate a disregard by the union of their obligations under existing contracts, which are still in force; that the demands are an autocratic notice that unless accepted the strike will be called in all the bituminous coal mines of the United States on November 1; that the decrease in hours will so reduce the producing ability of the mines that sufficient coal can not possibly be produced at times when most needed; that coal is a commodity most vital to the needs of the Nation; that the increase in wages and the decrease of hours would double, if not more than double, the cost of producing coal and thereby saddle upon every citizen of the country an increased cost of living; that the automatic penalty clause (which now applies alike to the operator and miner) is necessary for the enforcement of contracts that may be made; that the demand for expiration of all contracts in November instead of April is a menace to the public and places a weapon in the hands of the union to which it is not entitled, because November is the beginning of the winter season.

"Part of the claim of the operators that the union and mine workers still have a contract running until March 31, 1920, is the agreement the union and mine workers made with the Government through Fuel Administrator Garfield and which Mr. Garfield has recently announced is still in effect.

"These demands of the union are oppressive, despotic, and tyrannical. The union can not justify the claim for increase in wages concurrent with a demand for decrease in hours. The wages paid are sufficient and miners who will work full time now make good earnings. There can be no logic in the request for a decrease in hours of work. The working time at present is 48 hours per week. They now demand the working hours shall be decreased to 30, but at the same time they would require the operators to pay 60 per cent more for 30 hours' work than for 48 hours' work on the present schedule.

"A large number of miners do not belong to the union. They work in "open shop" mines. But experience has shown that in a crisis of this kind the nonunion miners stop work from fear. Furthermore, whatever wages and hours apply at union mines invariably are forced upon the "open-shop" mines.

"A schedule of the present wages and the proposed wages will be added to this communication, but in order that you may see clearly what is proposed, we will mention at this place that a mule driver who now gets $5.24 for eight hours' work expects to get $8.38 for six hours' work.

"It should, however, be mentioned that the intention of the union to work six hours (instead of eight) will not work out that way, because the proposal is not that the men shall spend six hours in the working places, but that they shall remain in the mine only six hours' total, using company time, not theirs, going from the mouth of the mine to their working places and back, so it is estimated that the actual working time will not exceed a total of five hours per day, or 25 hours per week.

"A competent miner, willing to work, can now earn $250 per month working eight hours per day, which exceeds the monthly earnings of the average doctor, lawyer, clerk, farmer, salesman, or merchant.

"The decrease in hours will reduce the output of the mines to an alarming extent. Mathematical calculation shows that a mine producing 50,000 tons per month can not possibly produce over 30,000 tons per month under the demands made, and the producing ability of a mine at the critical time of the year when coal is most needed will not exceed 60 per cent of its former output. And it goes without saying that the country can not secure sufficient coal under these reduced hours to take care of its present needs, much less to thrive and prosper as Americans expect. Under the proposed rules it will be impossible to double shift, because it will be seen, by what has been said before, that the miners have anticipated that possibility and have provided against any increased production by that method.

"Their entire plan has been worked out with deliberation and precision, the evident purpose being to control beyond peradventure any possibility of increasing the working force (because the working force can not be increased except by double shifting), and the inevitable result of this sort of control is increase in cost, which increased cost must be paid by the consuming public, otherwise the mines can not run at all.

"It is not conceivable that the public at large desires the operator to purchase peace with the miner and the miners' organization at such expense to the operator and therefore to the consumer.

"The demand, in fact, is for a decrease of 48 per cent in working time and an increase of 60 per cent in wages. We are stating below a few of the occupations, showing the wages paid now and the wages demanded:

"Wages.

	What men get now—They are getting for 8 hours' work—	What they want to get—They demand for 6 hours' work—
Mule drivers.....per day..	$5.24	$8.38
Motor men.....do....	5.24	8.38
Rope riders.....do....	5.24	8.38
Rockmen.....do....	5.24	8.38
Shot firers.....do....	5.32	8.51
Pump men.....do....	5.12	8.19
Timbermen.....do....	5.28	8.45
Tracklayers.....do....	5.28	8.45
Tipple men.....do....	4.20	6.72
Teamsters.....do....	4.39	7.02
Engineers.....do....	5.15	8.24
Blacksmiths.....do....	5.51	8.82
Carpenters.....do....	6.05	9.68

"And so on through the list.

"It is time for the citizens of the country to express their opinion. If the support of the public is not received the operator may be forced to accede to the demands, because the public must have coal.

"If the support of the public is to be effective, the citizens of the country must appeal to their Senators and Congressmen in Washington, and these appeals must be made promptly. It is a safe statement to make that the Senators and Congressmen will assume that the public is willing to pay if the public makes no protest to Congress, and we therefore urge that you, your friends, and public officials immediately telegraph to their Senators and Congressmen in Washington opposing the strike, opposing the increase in wages, and opposing the shortening of hours of work at the coal mines.

"The high cost of living can only be remedied by increasing production. It can not be remedied by decreasing output.

"If the union succeeds in the demands, the increase in cost and price of coal to you will be for all time and not a temporary matter.

"THE COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO
COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,

"DENVER, COLO., October 20, 1919.

"P. S.—In addition to telegraphing Senators and Congressmen, you should talk this over with your customers, with electric and water-plant managers, hold town meetings, pass resolutions, sending the resolutions to Washington. This is your business. Dont' leave it to 'somebody else.'"

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, in view of the impending coal strike, which I believe from latest information will be ordered or has been ordered, I desire to offer for printing in the RECORD certain telegrams bearing on the situation which I have selected from among a great number that have reached me from Colorado. I think they will interest the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

DENVER, COLO, October 21, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The threatened coal strike will mean Nation-wide suffering and closing down of all industries; the demands made by coal miners for a 30-hour week and 60 per cent increase in wages will raise the cost of coal to a figure that will be prohibitive and at the same time curtail the production of many million tons annually. There is not enough coal produced now under eight hours per day worked at the mines to take care of the present demand with the entire winter before us. Every individual and industry is vitally interested, for the result will be an enormous increase in the cost of all the necessities of life. We sincerely trust you will use your influence to avert strike and to oppose any settlement that would result in an increased cost of coal to the consumer or any change in present working hours at the mines, in view of the fact that present wages for mine labor are commensurate with present living costs, and the eight-hour day is a very reasonable workday.

THE DENVER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION.

LAMAR, COLO., October 23, 1919.

LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Denver, Colo.:

Board of governors, this association, go on record as opposed to miners' demands for shorter hours, increase in pay, and calling of the proposed strike. We feel that demands miners are making are unreasonable and inopportune and detrimental to the public welfare. Public sentiments in this community very strongly against miners' attitude and demands. We urge your every action to avoid this crisis.

YOUNG MEN'S BUSINESS ASSOCIATION,
By R. E. NYE, President.

CANON CITY, COLO., October 24, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Chamber of Commerce of Canon City, Colo., on behalf of the general public, requests and expects you to oppose all measures looking to any adjustment of the pending coal strike that will place a future burden upon the public. We feel the time has arrived to stand firm to the end and test whether American policies shall be be in the interest of all or only a class.

DAVID L. ROBINSON, President.
E. A. BRADBURY, Secretary.

DENVER, COLO., October 25, 1919.

LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The demands made by the United Mine Workers of America upon the coal operators are extravagant and un-American. They amount to a demand for the subjection of the interests of the whole public to the selfish wishes of the agitators who in our State do not represent the sound judgment of the miners, and if it were possible to accede to them it would bring the great majority of the industrious and patriotic people of this country on the verge of ruin. It would curtail the coal supply and raise the cost of coal and products dependent upon coal to a point which would put them beyond the reach of ordinary people and the weaker industries, which make up the greatest bulk of the country's business. We believe that the demand should be resisted and that the operators in resisting such demands should have the unstinted support of all officers of the law, Federal and State, in the enforcement of the rights of the public against this attempt to wreck the industry of America.

DENVER CIVIC AND COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLO., October 27, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Hon. GUY U. HARDY,
Congressional Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

In view of the threatened strike of bituminous-coal miners which may be called November 1, we, the board of county commissioners of Teller County and the mayor of Cripple Creek and the mayor of Victor, ask that you, our representatives in Congress, use your influence and authority to avert this uncalled-for strike. Such a strike will cause an unjust hardship to American industry. We urge that Congress adopt necessary measures to assure a sufficient supply of coal for industry and for the public.

THE BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF TELLER COUNTY.
THE MAYOR OF THE CITY OF CRIPPLE CREEK.
THE MAYOR OF THE CITY OF VICTOR.

FORT MORGAN, COLO., October 27, 1919.

Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the impending strike of the United Mine Workers of America is a serious menace to the welfare of our community and our country; and Whereas, in so far as the State of Colorado is concerned, such a strike is in violation of the solemn pledge of the mine workers and is to be called for the purpose of enforcing demands not only unjust, unreasonable, and outrageous, but impossible of fulfillment, without working grave and serious injury to the vast majority of our citizens: Be it therefore

Resolved, That it is the sense of this community that such demands should be resisted and that the operators in resisting such demands should have the undivided support of all officers of the law, Federal and State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to our Representatives in Congress.

CHARITABLE WORK OF KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a brief statement of the Knights of Columbus, of Marshall, Tex., in protest against certain action of the War Department, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARSHALL, TEX., October 18, 1919.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
1620 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Whereas the War Department of the United States has decided to assume the war work now being carried on by the seven charitable organizations, and whereas the societies have acquitted themselves well during the war and after it, be it resolved that the Knights of Columbus of Marshall Council, No. 1422, formally protest against such action through the Texas Senators.

Respectfully, yours,
[SEAL.] A. J. DUGAS, Grand Knight.

COAL STATISTICS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I send to the desk a compilation of figures prepared by the Geological Survey showing the production of bituminous coal this year as compared with last year, and also the improvement which has been shown since the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee took up the subject with the Director General of Railroads. I ask that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the House of Representatives recently passed a bill for the protection and upbuilding of the American dye industry, and the bill will soon be before the Senate. It is a matter of such grave consequence that I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a pamphlet which contains the opinion of Army and naval officials as to the importance of the dye industry as a matter of national preparation.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[American dyestuffs or national disaster: "American vat-dyes are the key to the American dyestuff and chemical industry, the key to our national security and independence." Reprinted from Textiles, Boston, Mass., September, 1919.]

"AMERICAN DYES OR NATIONAL DISASTER.

"The letter which follows is from a prominent manufacturer of ginghams and wash goods. As it undoubtedly represents the mistaken attitude of a number of textile manufacturers, we are replying to it here at some length in order to point out their error and secure their support for the only right policy for Americans at the present time:

"AUGUST 13, 1919.

"EDITOR OF TEXTILES,
"Boston, Mass.

"DEAR SIR: As there is so much talk in regard to the present dye situation, I would like to give you my opinion and find out, if possible, how you stand on this subject.

"We manufacture at this mill a high grade romper cloth which requires a very fast dye. Up to the beginning of the war these colors were dyed almost wholly with vat dyestuffs. These vat colors are not being manufactured in this country to-day, and upon inquiry various dyestuff manufacturers have advised me that they will have none on the market in the near future. We are using indigo for our dark blues and have been forced to use a vat blue imported from Switzerland at a very high price for our light blues. We have managed to struggle along with sulphur colors on some of the other shades, but have been forced to use a direct pink on all goods dyed that shade. Direct colors at their best are very unsatisfactory and only a few plants in this country are equipped properly for the dyeing of alizarine reds or pinks.

"Vat dyes are being manufactured in England, but the agents of these manufacturers in this country have advised me that they are unable to obtain the proper license to import these dyestuffs. Shirtings being imported from England are dyed with these dyestuffs and shirtings imported from Japan are also dyed with dyestuffs in this class, whose origin, I have every reason to believe, is German.

"Shall the American manufacturer be handicapped due to a hate propaganda, started from the Lord knows where, while his competitors in other countries go merrily on and manufacture goods containing dyestuffs which are impossible for him to obtain? We are using and want to use American dyestuffs, but do not want to be forced to be without dyestuffs of certain classes as long as they are obtainable in other countries, and we believe that until such a time as the American manufacturers are able to put a dyestuff of this class on the market, the requirements of dyestuffs of this class by the American manufacturer should be satisfied. Then, and only then, should foreign products be barred.

"Thanking you for your opinion on this matter at an early date, I am,

"Very truly, yours,

"_____ _____."

"CHEMICAL WARFARE.

"The one decisive factor in this dyestuffs problem is that the United States must have a self-contained chemical and coal-tar dyestuff industry in order to prepare the Nation for defense against external aggression. In the face of this necessity all conflicting considerations sink into insignificance. The Great War that is now drawing to a close marked the extraordinary development of warfare with chemicals, which is certain to be carried still further in future conflicts between the nations.

"No nation is safe that is without a well-equipped industry for the production of an ample supply of explosives and poison gases equal, and, if possible, superior, in efficiency to those possessed by any possible aggressor. It is not enough to pattern the destructive power and the quantity of these chemicals on the experience of the Great War. The ablest and most highly organized chemists in the world will continue in the employ of our prospective antagonists, their efforts stimulated by a spirit of revenge, obtaining by laborious research new and more terrible methods of destruction, which will be revealed to us only when the hour for the attack on America arrives.

"America must have a self-contained chemical industry if America is to remain free. And that industry can be obtained only by the establishment in time of peace of a coal-tar dyestuff industry second to none in the world. Here are a few passages from the testimony of military experts, bearing on this national necessity:

"DYESTUFFS, EXPLOSIVES, AND POISON GAS.

"Maj. Gen. W. L. Sibert, United States Army, chief of the Chemical Warfare Service in the United States:

"Dyestuffs are directly related to several of our gases; the same crudes or intermediates that are used in making dyes are also utilized in making such gases. The processes involved in the making of dyes, explosives, and poison gases are identical to a certain stage. They all begin with the dry distillation of coal. The crudes, benzol, toluol, xylol, when subjected to chemical processing, yield intermediates which on further treatment enable us to obtain dyes, explosives, or poison gases. The dyestuff industry is the one peace-time enterprise which will, therefore, furnish us with the plants and equipment which can be hurriedly converted to essential uses in time of war. There is another point which is worthy of special emphasis: 'We are not only concerned with plants and equipment, but also with the trained personnel needed.'

"Chemical warfare is a new warfare, but one that was responsible for about 30 per cent of our casualties. At the same time it is probably the most humane system of warfare, because there are fewer deaths from those casualties than from any other cause, but it has in it an element that no other kind of warfare has, and that is the element of surprise sprung on an army through the development of some new substance, rendering you absolutely helpless, as the English were at Ypres.

"Germany always had a large supply of explosives, and had a larger quantity of gas than the Allies had until near the end of the war. This was largely due to the existence of dyestuff plants in Germany. When our troops entered Germany they found a phosgene gas plant with a capacity of 10 tons a day, built before the war in connection with the dyestuff industry.

"It was the unexpected use of gas on a large scale that caused the Germans nearly to win the war last spring a year ago. It was for that reason that we immediately decided to multiply by five our output.

"Certain materials which are indispensable for dyes are also indispensable for gas and high explosives. There is no substitute, but they are all indispensable for war purposes.

"A nation absolutely unprepared in so far as gas is concerned, and defenseless against gas, would be helpless. Any country which had a large supply or a potential supply for gas would be a bad country to declare war against."

"Lieut. Col. Amos A. Fries, Chief of the Chemical Warfare Service of the American Expeditionary Forces:

"We found in attacks against these machine-gun nests and strong points that if we filled these bombs with T. N. T. instead of poisonous gas and 50 to 100 were dropped we simply wiped everything off the surface. A very famous incident occurred at the time of the fighting at St. Mihiel when at a place called Cotes des Eparges our troops captured what the French had been trying three or four years to take. Our officers stated that they could take it by firing a hundred of these bombs, and they installed them the night before the attack and fired them so successfully the next morning that our men got across without any loss or a hostile shot being fired until they got across. That is a part of warfare that will increase the use of T. N. T. very much.

"If we ever get into a very serious war in the future, it will require a very much greater use of high explosives than were used in this war, as we would throw bombs over in quantities of 2,000 or 3,000 at a time. The projectiles are fired together by using closely synchronized watches. The British fired into Lens 2,000 of these projectiles at one time.

"Research can be made in these dyestuff factories so independently of any outside appearance that it looks impossible for any country to be sure that another country is not working on this matter, no matter what one country might try to do.

"If you are going to fight a defensive campaign you would use mustard gas, which is a very low volatile liquid and lies on the ground two or three days on days like this and a week or 10 days in moist, cool weather. The vapors come up and burn the body, and you are never safe from it, and hence you have got to wear a mask all the time. It is that persistence which gets so many casualties, because it is so difficult to get away from it. I would like to add that because the Germans had run out of their reserve of gas they had no mustard gas whatever, which is what saved many boys in the Argonne fight.

"One of the principal elements in preparedness for war consists in a well-developed chemical industry."

"Lieut. Commander O. M. Hustvedt, Bureau of Ordnance, United States Navy Department:

"The development of the dye industry would give us plants which could readily be converted to war purposes for the manufacture of gas or for the manufacture of high explosives, and would give us the trained personnel, especially chemists, that we would need in adapting and developing the dye industry to war uses; and also during normal times would give us the benefit of researches which are conducted by the dye people in the development of their colorings. In those researches they have found in the past and probably in the future will find developments of a great deal of importance to the explosive industry, as well as in poison gases for military use."

"The United States must have a self-contained and complete coal-tar dyestuff industry in time of peace in order to be ready to defend itself against external aggression. We all hope that there will never be another war, but it would be criminal folly to shut our eyes to the fact that in the future we shall be in danger of an attack from the East by the enemies that are now defeated, but not conquered, and also from the West by the Asiatic empire that is so closely patterned after the Prussian military autocracy, and that a realignment of nations might force us to defend ourselves against a simultaneous attack from both directions. We can prepare ourselves against these dangers only by establishing on American soil a self-contained chemical and coal-tar dyestuff industry of ample proportions.

"THE WAR AGAINST DISEASE.

"There is another controlling reason for our possession of a complete chemical and dyestuff industry, namely, the vast possibilities in chemical research for conquering disease and prolonging human life. This phase of the question was well stated by Joseph H. Choate, jr., counsel for the Chemical Foundation and American Dyes Institute, before the Ways and Means Committee:

"The human body consists of hundreds of little chemical factories pouring into the human system drugs of their own, and upon the balance of those drugs depends human health. These drugs are organic chemicals, and until the process of studying out their effects has been completed and the innumerable millions of combinations of chemicals which they produce in the human inside have been reduced to scientific formulæ that can be known and studied that science will remain in its infancy.

"Now, the dye laboratories furnish the means, and the only means, for the furtherance of that science, and that science has but recently begun to grow. It has been held back by the immense development of bacteriological medicine with its serums and antitoxins, which has been so successful that the physicians of the world have only recently turned back from it to the study of drugs. Yet the results have been startling. Many of those results have been not only the product of industrial chemists at our laboratories of coal-tar research, but in many cases the discoveries have been made in the dye laboratories themselves.

"In Germany the cooperation between the academic and coal-tar chemists was so complete that it was not an uncommon sight to see in the dye-works laboratory dozens of academic chemists working side by side with the dye-works chemists on their own individual problems. Many of the greatest discoveries have been made in that way. Salvarsan itself was a dye-works product. Dr. Ehrlich had a theory that arsenic disseminated in the system in a particular way would kill the germs of the cruelest scourge of humanity, and he had an idea that it could be done without injury by one of a particular group of compounds that number, say, 10,000. But how was he to get the facilities to make the experiments? Where could he get the apparatus, materials, and assistants for the work? No university, no private laboratory could undertake it. He found the means at his hands in the dye-works laboratory of the great Cassella dye works, and the Cassella laboratories were placed at his disposal. And within a very few months that immense problem was worked out and that amazing triumph achieved.

"So, in like manner, drugs for hundreds of other ailments have been developed. The most noted example is that of adrenalin, one of the most valuable and commonly used drugs. That was discovered in this country from an animal source. The German plants, as is possible with almost any of the drugs from an animal source, produced the substance synthetically from coal-tar products at a mere fraction of the cost of the animal product.

"And so we say to you that the hope of the future in medical science lies in the great coal-tar industry; that there you find the promise, and the only promise, for the discovery of drugs to cure the cruel diseases which are the scourge of humanity. There and there only lies the hope of the permanent cure of such diseases as tuberculosis and even cancer.

"Dr. Julius Stieglitz, professor of organic chemistry at the University of Chicago and chairman of the National Research Council of the Council of National Defense, made this statement on the same subject:

"Dr. Cantell, of the Mayo Foundation, has isolated the active principle of the thyroid gland and pure cocaine and determined its nature, and the difference the injection makes between health and diseases is tremendous. Lack of the principle leaves a dwarfed physical and mental condition. The injection of a minute quantity brings these people into a condition of health. Now, Dr. Cantell himself proved this principle from slaughtered animals, getting a minute trace from the thyroid of each animal. The principal material is a derivative we call indo, because it is related to indigo, and there is no question but that in the course of time we will be able to prepare this in pure form from coal-tar products

"Those are the directions in which synthetic work is going on, the production of specifics for the killing of invading germs; improvement of the natural products like cocaine and quinine, and also the artificial production of internal secretions in which a given patient may show a deficiency. Now, all of these developments would be tremendously strengthened if we had, as the roots of organic chemistry, a dye industry. That is the one branch of organic chemistry which has to be developed on a large scale, and, given the strong roots we have in the dye industry, the rest will take care of itself. Many of the institutions, like the Rockefeller Institution, the Mayo Foundation, and many of the universities, are developing these lines of medicinal drugs. We are dependent, however, on the original source of supply for our crude materials, and also on the source of supply of what we call organic chemists as against the mineral chemists, who are sufficiently strongly represented in this country. The dye industry is the sole industry from which we can get our materials and our chemists and which can support the type of work which we have in mind.

"It is inconceivable that America will be satisfied with anything less than a leading part in this chemical warfare against physical and mental weakness, disease, and death.

"A GERMAN PLOT THAT FAILED.

"A complete chemical and dyestuff industry is a necessity not only for the safety of the Nation and for taking our rightful part in the chemical warfare against disease and death, but for the prosperity and safety of American industries. We have had the proof of this in recent years. When the war cut off the United States from the supply of German dyestuffs in 1914 the country faced a period of black and white in the textile industry. Only the courage and enterprise of the few men engaged in the dyestuff assembling plants saved us from that disgraceful situation. The United States Government was on the point of being forced to close its printing and engraving plants because of the lack of German colors and the faded tint of the United States postage stamps excited the taunts and jeers of the Germans, while great industries giving employment to millions were facing a general shutdown. That all this was part of the German attack on the world is proved by the following cable, discovered by the agents of the Department of Justice, from Ambassador Bernstorff to the Berlin Government, the Hossenfelder mentioned being the German consul at New York:

"Serial No. 432, of March 13, 1915. It is reported to me by Hossenfelder, telegram No. 4, that the stock of dyes in this country is so small that by a German embargo about 4,000,000 American workmen might be thrown out of employment.

"A few weeks later a delegation of textile manufacturers called at the White House and also on Secretary of State Lansing and Secretary of Commerce Redfield to make an urgent appeal that steps be taken to obtain England's permission for the importation of German dyes. Later in the day they also called on Ambassador Bernstorff, the following report from the New York Times of their conference at the German Embassy showing plainly how Germany was using her dyestuff monopoly to carry on the war against the Entente and even then against the United States:

"When the textile representatives called at the German Embassy after their conference with Government officials, the Ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, suggested that there would be no further trouble about dyestuffs shipments if they could get the United States to threaten an embargo on exports of war supplies to Great Britain unless interference with trade between America and Germany in foodstuffs, cotton, and other noncontraband goods ceased.

"A month later a German torpedo, loaded with explosives made in the same industry that produced the German dyes with which Bernstorff hoped to force the United States into collision with England, sunk the Lusitania, revealed the great truth of the war to the American people, and made the German plot impossible.

"If it had succeeded Germany in all probability would have won the war and the terms of peace would have been dictated from Berlin.

"The signing of a peace treaty will not end Germany's war on the world. Germany knows that a dyestuff monopoly under certain conditions is a more effective instrument of destruction than an army or navy. That to-day is the lesson for Americans in connection with the building up of the dyestuff industry in the United States.

"A complete and wholly self-contained chemical and dyestuff industry is an American necessity on the score of military and naval defense, the physical and mental well-being of mankind, and the industrial prosperity of the United States. This brings us to the only remaining question: How can such an industry be created and maintained? It can be done only by allowing the American dyestuff and chemical industry to organize in as large units as may be necessary for the highest attainable efficiency and economy of production and research, and by protecting this home industry against every form of injurious competition from foreign countries. This protection must not be limited to tariffs, but must be provided in every effective form, whether by tariff, control of imports by licenses, exclusion of imports if necessary, control and compulsory working of patents, or by any other effective measure that can be devised. No one of these methods will be enough. All combined are essential to success.

"A GIANT INDUSTRY.

"The industry must be allowed to combine in order to produce as efficiently as the gigantic German industry, which has 40 years the start of us and which will wage relentless war against American products. Here are two statements on the present size and resources of the German industry:

"Joseph H. Choate, jr., before Ways and Means Committee:

"The smallest of the German companies employed before the war began more than the largest three, certainly the largest two, American houses now employ or have ever employed. They (the German companies) employed together, before the beginning of the war, approximately 50,000 men. About 1910 they coalesced into two large trusts, one consisting of three of the big six, the Bayer, Badische, and Berlin, and the other consisting of the other three, the Hoechst, Cassella, and Kalle. These companies were closely united and assisted each other in every possible way. They had joint funds for fighting foreign competition and dividing the expense of new things, and dividing the expense of campaigns against competing industries in other countries.

"But it did not stop here. In 1916, finding the danger they were placed in as a result of the war, the two trusts were combined with all the other outlying companies into one gigantic trust. This enormous trust has a nominal capital, adding up the nominal capitals of the various companies of which it is composed, of about $100,000,000. But the stocks of these companies were, on the average, worth on the Berlin Stock Exchange, at the time of the combination, about 400. So you can see the actual assets of the company were valued by the German public at above $400,000,000.

"Lord Moulton's (British minister of munitions) letter to Mr. Choate:

"In the year 1916 the Chemische Fabrik Gaisheim-Electron entered into a community of interests with the following firms: Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, Ludwigshafen-on-the-Rhine; Farbenfabriken vorm. Friedrich Bayer & Co., Leverkusen, Aktien-Gesellschaft fur Anilinfabrikation, Berlin; Farbwerke vorm. Meister, Lucius & Bruning, Hoechst-on-Main; Leopold Casella & Co. G.m.b.H., Frankfort-on-Main; Kalle & Co., A. G., Beibrich-on-Rhine; Chemische Fabriken vorm. Weiler-ter-Meer, Uerdingen—from January 1, 1917, so far as the Chemische Fabrik Greischeim-Elektron is concerned, for a period of 50 years from January 1, 1918.

"The choice for America is between safety with a unified chemical and dyestuff industry which our people can control at home, or political and industrial dependence on a foreign monopoly over which we can exercise no control whatever.

"RUTHLESS GERMAN METHODS.

"Now, as to the ruthless methods of this German trust. Here are a few examples which can be multiplied indefinitely:

"Henri Hauser, professor at Dijon University, France:

"Why, at the outbreak of the war, were we (the French) short of essential products for the manufacture of our explosives, such as phenic acid? Because in peace time, in the tenders to the French ministry of war, the Germans always offered enormous abatements, descending below the French cost price, and thus carried off the orders. Thus, discouraged, our manufacturers abandoned the sinking of capital in installations so costly to retrieve, and therefore the industry of phenic acid disappeared in France."

"Joseph H. Choate, jr.:

"You will find in the Alien Property Custodian's report a number of instances of the way in which they (the Germans) operated. As soon as an industry began to show its head in another country, they went at it tooth and nail. They began to sell not only below what it cost in this country but below the cost of production in their own country, and in some instances, I think in many, there was no limit to which they were not willing to cut prices in order to get business. A few examples will be as good as a million. Until about 1910 there was no production of anilin oil in this country. And in that year the Benzol Products Co. was organized to make anilin oil on a large scale. At that time the price of anilin oil was about 11½ cents. The Benzol Products Co. could do the work and make money at that figure. They had not got fairly started when the Germans began cutting the price for the first time. The cutting continued until the German price reached about 6 cents. One large customer was approached by the Benzol Products Co. with an offer of anilin oil for 8½ cents, an unheard-of price up to that time. The answer was, 'I won't take your product at 8½ cents or any other price, because whatever price you name I have the assurance that the German producers will undersell you.'"

"PROTECTION AGAINST GERMAN METHODS.

"Having given the industry liberty to organize on the most efficient basis, protection must be provided against foreign competition. Protective tariffs must be imposed, but no practicable tariff will alone provide the necessary protection. Why? Because of German dumping, which Prof. Henri Hauser describes in these words:

"German dumping is a coherent system. It first kills the preparative industries in the country in which it installs itself. Thanks to the system of bonuses, it can then challenge the transformation industries.

"German industry thus shatters all the forces which can compete with it in such a way as to reign over the ruins. Once again, German dumping is not a procedure of economic action; it is, in times of unclouded peace and under deceptively peaceful aspects, a measure of war. It carries agitation into the internal life of competitors of Germany; it puts out of tune the normal play of their customs system; it absolutely falsifies every formula of commercial liberty, of equality of treatment, or of reciprocity inscribed in treaties."

"SECRET REPORT OF A GERMAN AGENT.

"Here is one illustration of the German methods of circumventing protective tariffs. It is taken from a report by Dr. Hugo Schweitzer, American representative of the Bayer Co. and secret service agent of the German Government in the United States, which Wolf von Igel sent to von Bernstorff on January 26, 1917, six weeks before the United States entered the war, with the recommendation that it be passed on to Berlin, and the copy of which was seized by the United States Department of Justice. At that time a new tariff on dyestuffs had been imposed:

"The dyestuffs which are excepted from this specific duty are the so-called vat dyes, and these vat dyes are a comparatively modern achievement of the German dye technique and are in general regarded as the most genuine dyes.

"The preeminent coloring qualities of these products have already brought it about and will do it even more so in the future than the older anthracite coal-tar dyes, which in many respects are inferior to these vat dyes, will be driven from the market. The manufacture of these vat dyes is very complicated and can be undertaken only in a very highly developed industry. It is wholly out of the question that a new industry, like the American, can take up the manufacture of these vat dyestuffs, and it may well take a very long time before the dyestuff industry outside of Germany can concern itself with the manufacture of these complicated products. Here the very greatest exertions will not make it possible to cope with the competition of Germany.

"The history of American tariff legislation has shown that, in general, a protective tariff of 30 per cent ad valorem does not afford sufficient protection to create an American industry. A protective tariff of 30 per cent is, of course, absolutely insufficient for the complicated vat dyestuffs.

"Referring to the provision in the tariff law requiring the President to remove the special duties on dyestuffs if in five years the domestic production does not amount to 60 per cent of the domestic consumption, Schweitzer went on to say:

"Here is where the German industry must apply the lever. It must, in any case of these vat dyes which must be regarded as the 'highest quality' goods of the industry, dispose of in the American market more than 40 per cent of the total consumption in derivatives and dyestuffs, in order that the President will be in the position to abolish the specific duties. If this is actually made possible, and the President must abolish these specific duties, then the German industry will be in the same position as before the war and has only to deal with the duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, which, as has already been elucidated above, was insufficient in the past to create an American industry.

"That it should be as easy as child's play for the German industry to sell as much vat dyestuffs in the United States that the value of the same will amount to 60 per cent in value of the domestic consumption of the articles mentioned in Groups II and III of section 500, is apparent from the following considerations:

"1. The vat dyestuffs have in the past and will even more so in the future supplant the old anthracite coal-tar dyestuffs.

"2. The money value of the vat dyestuffs is uncommonly higher than the money value of the old anthracite coal-tar dyestuffs.

"3. The importation from Germany of these vat dyes amounts to-day already to 27.63 per cent of the money value of the total dyestuff importation.

"From these arguments it is clear that the salvation of the German dyestuff industry is to be sought in the development of the vat-dyestuff chemistry.

"And in this connection it is well to remember the German practice of 'full line forcing' by which orders for special dyestuffs are refused unless the customer agrees to buy from the Germans all of the dyestuffs he uses. 'Buy all your dyes from us or go without vat dyes.'

"American vat dyes are the key to the American dyestuff and chemical industry, the key to our national security and independence.

"A TARIFF AND A LICENSE SYSTEM BOTH ESSENTIAL.

"The complex character of chemicals, and particularly of coal-tar chemicals, makes it possible for the Germans to camouflage the products beyond the possibility of detecting undervaluation.

"The lesson which the Germans themselves teach us is that any tariff we impose should be specific as well as ad valorem, and even then considered only as one of several methods of protection. So far as import restrictions are concerned, the additional measures must consist of the exclusion of products that are being made in the United States, and licenses to import, subject to the regular tariff rates, other products that are not made here in sufficient quantity for domestic needs, the import licenses to continue as long as may be necessary. This system of exclusion, modified by import licenses, has already been adopted by England, France, and Japan, and must be adopted here if the United States is to have a complete dyestuff industry.

"No sound objection has been raised to this system of control by import licenses. Its opponents assert that under the license system it would be impossible for a textile manufacturer to get the dyestuffs from Germany in time for the dyeing and delivery of goods on orders. Those who advance that claim either have an ulterior object in preventing the development of an American dyestuff industry or a very poor opinion of the power and resources of the United States Government. As we write these lines a Washington dispatch reports that Alien Property Custodian Garvan has asked the President for permission to import a six months' supply of German vat dyes, thus showing the entire practicability of the proposed system of licenses. It is also pretended by opponents of the license system that under it the dyestuff purchases by a manufacturer would be made known to his competitors. These opponents of real protection to American dyestuffs would have us believe that the United States Government would not or could not protect its own citizens by holding such details in confidence. And it is for such flimsy pretexts that they would have us abandon the great essential to the safety and welfare of the Nation.

"COMPULSORY WORKING OF PATENTS.

"Another necessary method of protection is the control and compulsory working of foreign patents in the United States as has been practiced in Germany for over 40 years. Before the war our patent laws enabled the Germans to patent their processes here and then leave them unworked, the purpose being to prevent competitors from using the German processes. The United States law thus served as a complete protection to the German dyestuff monopoly. It is plain that these conditions must be abolished and our patent law so changed that a foreign patent will remain in force only on condition that the patentee either works it adequately in the United States or grants proper licenses for such working.

"THE SITUATION TO-DAY.

"As a result of the war a promising dyestuff industry has been built up in the United States, but is threatened with sure destruction unless protected against the unscrupulous competition of the German trust when commercial relations with Germany are restored. Far-seeing men in the office of the Alien Property Custodian seized time by the forelock and had most of the German dyestuff patents to the number of 4,500 sold to trustees under the name of the Chemical Foundation in order to keep them free from control by private monopoly and used only in the interest of the Nation. The remaining 1,200 German patents had been sold to a private company at the auction sale of the Bayer Co.'s assets before the trust was organized, but arrangements have been made with the purchasers by which these privately owned patents also are to be made available for building up the dyestuff industry of the whole country. The Longworth bill has been framed by the friends of an American dyestuff industry and provides for the necessary protection by a system of import licenses under which a commission representing the consumers and producers of dyestuffs and the general public is compelled to grant licenses for the importation of dyestuffs that are not produced in adequate amounts for domestic requirements. And finally the Alien Property Custodian is seeking permission to import a six months' supply of vat dyes to tide over our manufacturers until vat dyes can be made in America.

"THE DUTY OF AMERICANS.

"Under such conditions the plain duty of every American, whether a user of dyestuffs or a consumer of dyed products, is to say, 'We are ready to wait as long as may be necessary and to submit to any necessary restriction or deprivation in order that America may possess a chemical and coal-tar dyestuff industry second to none, which will protect our Nation against external aggression, enable America to do its full duty in the chemical warfare against physical and mental weakness, disease, and death, and provide a safe and sure foundation for American industry and enterprise.'

"The difficulties of which our correspondent complains, even if they were not temporary and the remedy were not already in sight, amount to nothing compared with the great objects to be attained by establishing an American dyestuff and chemical industry or with the disaster that may befall this country if we neglect this great duty because of a lack of moral strength to see it through. Now is the appointed time. If we weakly yield now it may not be possible to succeed before the Nation is suddenly overwhelmed with military and economic ruin. The producers of dyestuffs, manufacturers of textiles, and the people of the United States should be a unit in this work. Most of the German patents have been placed in the control of trustees to be used in this national enterprise. The bill now before Congress aims to provide all the legislative means for protecting and developing the industry, and to afford relief from temporary inconvenience to users of dyestuffs not yet made in the United States. Great aggregations of capital and skill are concentrating their resources on the solution of the still unsolved problems. All that is needed are the enactment of the necessary protective laws and time in which to discover and perfect the chemical processes of producing certain dyestuffs. Complete success is certain if Americans stand together.

"If there is any hate propaganda it is made, not in America, but in Germany where hate is one of the manufactured products of Prussia, directed first against one nation and then against another, France, Russia, England, Japan, or the United States in turn, in order to serve the purposes of the German autocracy in its schemes for world dominion.

"Our correspondent complains that American importers can not get licenses from the English Government to bring English vat-dyes into the United States. That is not the fault of the United States Government, for the Washington authorities have been ready at all times to allow the importation of English vat-dyes. It is because the importers can not get licenses from the British Government to export these English vat-dyes. Of course they can not. The citizens of a country have the first right to the consumption of what they produce. England has had a bigger and far more bitter dose of German frightfulness than we have had, and has resolved never again to expose the empire to destruction industrially and politically by forces gathered in German chemical works. A good example for the United States to follow.

"Our correspondent also complains of the importation of Japanese cotton goods dyed with German dyestuffs. Well, let us shut them out by an adequate protective tariff. But what right have textile manufacturers to ask protection for the products they sell if they do not insist on protection for the products they buy? American industries stand or fall together. The citizens of a country have the first right to the production of what they consume.

"We hope that our correspondent and all who are in his state of mind will see their mistake and lose no time in getting on the right track. Let them write to the President and Members of both Houses of Congress and insist that party politics have no part in the settlement of this chemical and dyestuff problem; that Republican protectionists be broad enough to admit that this is a problem of which a tariff alone will not afford a complete solution; that Democratic supporters of a revenue tariff recognize that dyestuffs present a case involving the safety of the Nation in which Adam Smith himself would have supported the most rigid restrictions on imports. Let us all be for America first in order that in the years to come we may look back with pride to the part we took in protecting our country and civilization by the development of a complete and self-contained dyestuff and chemical industry in the United States."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall move at the proper time to strike from the treaty the provisions relating to labor, and I invite the attention of the Senate to the reasons, which I shall now give, for that motion.

It is a remarkable thing that certain of the very important and far-reaching provisions of the treaty have as yet been but little discussed. I refer to the labor articles appearing as article 23 of the covenant and Part XIII, from articles 387 to 427, inclusive, of the treaty. Labor throughout the United States has not been fully informed of the significance of this section of the treaty, but I am convinced that labor's interests and the interests of the American people generally are vitally affected by these provisions.

I am also of the opinion that Senators, engrossed in the consideration of other phases of this complex document, have not fully gauged the importance of the labor articles. Irrespective of the views of Senators regarding labor, the fundamental changes which Part XIII of the treaty will work in our political and domestic life should impel us to a critical and searching analysis of its provisions.

Article 23 of the covenant provides that members of the league agree:

(a) To "endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor" in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and will establish and maintain an international organization to accomplish that result. It is safe to say that no member nation of the league will be inclined to admit officially that it maintains within its own domains labor conditions that are not "fair and humane," so this provision, like most of the other provisions in this document, will be of no practical benefit to labor.

The next provision of article 23 is:

(b) Which provides that the members of the league "undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control."

Like the previous article, this article is meaningless, because it does not suggest what "just treatment of the native inhabitants" means. It is not to be supposed that any nation will take kindly to the advice of some other country as to how it should treat the inhabitants of territories under its control, any more than it is likely to accept advice concerning its own labor conditions. Under the arrangement contemplated, the King of Siam and the King of Hedjaz would be official advisers to the United States concerning its labor conditions, as well as the way it should treat the Filipinos.

The next provision of article 23 is subdivision:

(c) Which provides that the members "will entrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs."

It will be noted that it is not proposed to abolish the traffic in women and children nor the traffic in opium. But when we go into this arrangement, we are merely going to aid in "supervising" this traffic.

The next provision is:

(d) That the members "will entrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest."

I commend this provision to Ireland, India, and Egypt, and other peoples subject to Great Britain. Under this arrangement Great Britain will not need to trouble herself about keeping arms out of Ireland or any other of her rebellious Provinces, but the league—including, of course, the United States—will perform this service for her.

The next provision of article 23 is:

(e) That the members of the league "will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for commerce of all members of the league. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be borne in mind."

It will be noted that according to this provision a nation is no longer to determine for itself what constitutes equitable treatment for its commerce. The members of the league propose to take over that job. It seems that this must involve the regulation of tariffs and international trade agreements, which up to the present time nations have been free to agree upon as their interest might seem to require. But the provision I have quoted, if it means anything, means that the whole subject, if this article goes into effect, will be regulated by the league of nations.

The next and last provision of article 23 is:

(f) That the members of the league "will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease."

In connection with this provision, it is well to remember that by the blockade of Russia at the present time by the principal members of this league we are exterminating millions of people, largely women and children, through starvation and attendant diseases.

This is all of the so-called labor articles in the covenant. To pursue this subject further and arrive at the real significance of the labor provisions, it is necessary to turn to Part XIII of the treaty.

Without attempting to state the substance of the 40 long articles in the treaty, which create an international organization to control the labor of the world, I will briefly outline the scheme proposed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is addressing the Senate upon what I consider the most important part of the proposed treaty, and I ask, in deference to those of us who desire to hear what he says, that we have order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to maintain order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Article 387, which is the first of the so-called labor articles, provides for a permanent organization, and that—

The original members of the league of nations shall be the original members of this organization, and hereafter membership of the league of nations shall carry with it membership of the said organization.

Article 388 is as follows:

The permanent organization shall consist of:
(1) A General Conference of Representatives of the Members, and
(2) An International Labor Office controlled by the Governing Body described in article 393.

For convenience, I shall hereafter refer to the above organizations as the conference and as the governing body.

Article 389 provides that the conference shall hold meetings at least once a year and oftener if the occasion requires, and that "it shall be composed of four representatives of each of the member nations, two of whom shall be Government delegates and the two others shall be delegates representing, respectively, the employers and the workpeople of each of the members."

It is nowhere disclosed how the delegates from the United States would be selected, whether by the President, without confirmation by the Senate, or in some other manner.

Article 390 provides that every delegate shall be entitled to vote individually on all matters considered by the conference. By article 391 it is provided that the conference shall be held at the seat of the league of nations, or at such other place as the conference may decide upon. Article 392 provides that the International Labor Office shall be established at the seat of the league of nations as a part of the organization of the league.

We now come to article 393, which provides for the governing body. This body is to consist of 24 persons, appointed in accordance with the following provisions:

The Governing Body of the International Labor Office shall be constituted as follows:
Twelve persons representing the Governments.
Six persons elected by the delegates to the Conference representing the employers.
Six persons elected by the delegates to the Conference representing the workers.
Of the 12 persons representing the Governments 8 shall be nominated by members which are of the chief industrial importance and 4 shall be nominated by the members selected for the purpose by the Government delegates to the Conference, excluding the delegates of the 8 members mentioned above.

The members of the governing body shall hold office for three years. The governing body, by article 394, is to appoint a director of the International Labor Office, which latter seems to be the organ through which the governing body largely functions. The principal duties of the International Labor Office are provided for by article 396 and consist in preparing the program for the conference, collecting and distributing information, and publishing a newspaper in French and English, and such other languages as the governing body may think desirable. Then follow numerous provisions concerning the details of organization immaterial to my discussion.

When the agenda or program, which is settled by the governing body, comes before the conference for action the conference, if it decides on the adoption of any proposal so submitted, will determine whether the proposal shall take the form—

(a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the members.

I understand the language "draft international convention," as used in the above paragraph, to mean a treaty, which, so far as the United States is concerned, would become effective as a law for this country upon being adopted in the manner provided by the Constitution for making treaties.

It is further provided in article 405 that each of the member States will, if possible, within one year from the closing of the session of the conference, or at most within 18 months, "bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action."

This means, I take it, that within the periods mentioned the respective Governments of the members of the league would be called upon to concur in or reject the recommendation or draft convention proposed by the conference.

If any member—that is, the Government of any member—of the league, having ratified any draft convention, does not enforce it, it is provided by article 414 that measures "of an economic character" may be taken by the other members against the member so defaulting. What these measures "of an economic character" are, is not specified.

By article 411 it is provided that any member may file a complaint with the Labor Office, charging any other member with nonobservance of any convention which it has ratified, and this sets in motion the machinery provided through a Commission of Enquiry to determine the fact, and if the fact is determined against the defendant member, then the penalty of boycott, embargo, or penalty of other "economic character" may be applied.

A member is not allowed to interpret for itself the labor provisions of this treaty or of any subsequent convention concluded by the members under it, but by article 423 any question or dispute relating to the interpretation thereof is decided by the Permanent Court of International Justice, and by article 417 the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice on any complaint filed as above stated is made final. The Permanent Court of International Justice referred to in these articles is the court established by article 14 of the covenant of the league of nations.

Article 407 provides an additional method by which a draft convention may become binding upon members, namely, by agreement between certain members to make it effective as between themselves, even though it has not secured the necessary two-thirds vote in the conference to effect its adoption by that body.

I have now given, I believe, briefly but fairly and fully, a statement of the powers and procedure of the organizations which it is proposed to establish by the labor provisions of this treaty. There are, however, two provisions which, I understand, the defenders of the labor articles maintain will prevent possible injury to the cause of labor in the United States. But it has never been claimed by any representative of labor in this country, so far as I am aware, that this portion of the treaty can be relied on to benefit labor in the United States. Certain it is that Mr. Gompers, who presided over the commission which framed the articles, which, in a modified and much changed form, were embodied in the labor provisions of this treaty, has repeatedly stated, as I shall presently show, that he anticipated no particular benefit to labor in this country from these provisions, but expected them to benefit labor in other countries. Now, the provisions to which I refer are found in article 405, from which I have previously quoted. One of those provisions is as follows:

If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

It is claimed for this provision that if a recommendation or draft convention is offered for ratification in this country and we do not desire to ratify it, we have only to reject it and no obligation rests upon us concerning it. That is true, and it is equally true of every other member; therefore all that the most backward labor country has to do is to refuse to adopt the recommendation or draft convention, and its labor conditions, however deplorable, remain exactly where they were before. So that the best that can be said for this provision is that it nullifies the attempt to elevate labor conditions in the backward countries and brings to naught this whole high-sounding labor scheme and makes useless all this vast international labor machinery provided for in these articles.

But this is not the whole story. These articles are artfully drawn. Why is it provided that the recommendation may be presented to the respective Governments for adoption in two forms, one a recommendation for legislation and the other a "draft convention," to be adopted in such manner as treaties are adopted and made the law of the land?

I take it that any recommendation for legislation made to our Government would take the course of regular legislation. A bill would be introduced, debated publicly, hearings had upon it, discussed in the press, amended, finally passed by both Houses, and signed by the President. In this process the same protection would be given to the interests of labor as is given in the enactment of any other legislation. But in the case of a "draft convention" all this is changed. A "draft convention" is merely a proposed treaty, to be made effective as other treaties are made effective; that is, by concurrence therein of two-thirds of the Members of the Senate present and signature by the President. It would be debated in secret—I have no recollection of any treaty other than the one now under consideration having been debated publicly—and would not go to the more popular branch of the Congress for consideration at all. The reason for the different methods provided by the Constitution for making a treaty and enacting domestic legislation is obvious. Treaties are supposed to regulate intercourse between nations; legislation operates directly upon the rights of the citizen. Treaties, in theory at least, involve technical matters of international law and often secret and confidential matters, which in former times were not made public until ratified. None of these secret practices apply to legislation. I am not arguing that treaties should be considered in secret. I have always contended for publicity, but the method uniformly followed in the consideration of treaties has been one of secrecy. Now, the vice which goes to the very root of all the labor provisions of this proposed treaty is that they provide for the enactment of labor legislation by the secret and undemocratic method by which treaties are made.

Think of the possibility of putting through in the form of a "draft convention" a law against collective bargaining, against strikes, and combinations of labor, without any opportunity for labor to be heard or to resist such legislation!

Ah, but it will be said that there is another provision in this article which will prevent legislation of that sort in this country; and that brings me to the second of the provisions I previously referred to as being relied upon by some representatives of labor in this country to prove that the labor provisions of this treaty, at least, will not injure labor in the United States.

That provision is contained in the last paragraph of article 405, part 13, above mentioned. It reads as follows:

> In no case shall any member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

This provision was drafted by Mr. Gompers and adopted by the international commission for labor legislation at Paris, Mr. Gompers leading the fight for it.

Mr. Gompers presided over that Commission. It made the first draft of the labor provisions of this treaty, which were afterwards revised by the plenary session of the peace conference as incorporated in the treaty.

It appears from Mr. Gompers's statement—made at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor last June—that the work of that commission was a most unsatisfactory experience. In his efforts to make the labor provisions of this treaty a substantial benefit to the cause he serves he was voted down on nearly every proposition he presented.

Defeated, discouraged, baffled, he was on the point of refusing to sign the draft convention as president of the commission.

Evidently he could see nothing of promise in it for the American worker, and he was clearly apprehensive that it might prove harmful to the interests of the wage earners of the United States.

He then sought to shield and protect the labor of this country against the dangers which apparently he regarded as imminent, and he proposed and secured the adoption of the provision which now appears as the last paragraph of article 405, Part XIII, of the treaty before us.

Before it was adopted he says: "I declared that we could not be parties to the covenant as it then stood." He insisted, to quote his words, upon "some provision that would safeguard the rights and interests of the American wage earners."

His experiences in the legislative commission of which he was a member, and over which he presided, in drafting the protocol of the labor provisions of this treaty, had been such that he despaired of any benefit to American labor from it. At the conclusion of the work of that commission he decided that the best service he could render this country, if there were to be these labor provisions in this treaty, was to interpose a barrier between the body erected by these labor provisions and American labor, to prevent that body from striking down the benefits which American labor had secured in a long struggle for its betterment. So he proposed this amendment, and its adoption was really the condition upon which he, as president of that commission, consented to sign these labor articles. It is my purpose, Mr. President, to show how far the amendment falls short of protecting labor in this country.

Now, mark the language that was to safeguard American wage earners:

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Before the Senator goes on, I did not quite catch whether or not the Senator quoted the words that Mr. Gompers is alleged to have spoken as being used in the labor convention on the other side, or after it had adjourned, the language in which Mr. Gompers said that he did not hope for anything for the benefit of American labor, and that he insisted on this provision.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The language I used, Mr. President, let me say, is taken from the address Mr. Gompers made at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor held in June last at Atlantic City. In that address Mr. Gompers stated what he said to his associates upon the legislative commission, which made the first draft of the provisions that we have here before us, modified somewhat by the plenary session of the Paris peace conference thereafter. It is the statement that he made to his associates, that he would not consent to sign as president, or to recommend the work of the legislative commission over which he was presiding, unless there was interposed this amendment, that should save the situation as it now exists in this country so far as legislation protecting labor is concerned. He had such an experience as led him to believe that there was nothing progressive, nothing to the advantage of labor, that could come out of the work of that commission, and at the end of the whole matter he finally concluded that if it was to go through at all the best he could do was to interpose a barrier against tearing down and taking away from labor in this country the little that it has already gained in its long struggle to improve labor conditions.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. I merely want to ask the Senator if presently he is going to speak upon the possible membership of the conference?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am.

Mr. THOMAS. Not the conference; the governing body.

Mr. McCORMICK. The governing body.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall take that up.

Mr. McCORMICK. In the governing body it seems to me that oriental powers might be of chief industrial importance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think before I get through I shall make a complete analysis of the different bodies that exercise power under these labor articles.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, is it not a fact that after Mr. Gompers left Paris changes were made?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is.

Mr. FALL. And that Mr. Gompers corresponded by cablegram with the President of the United States and received an assurance that there were no material changes that would hurt labor here? Was not that correspondence also directed to the substitution of a word in the labor constitution of this country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is absolutely certain, and I shall deal particularly not with the correspondence but with the change that was made before I get through.

Mr. FALL. And the fact is that the word "merely" was written into the constitution of labor, so that it read that "labor was not merely a commodity"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; after Mr. Gompers's connection with the legislative commission had ceased.

Mr. FALL. That is it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, mark the language that was prepared by Mr. Gompers to safeguard American wage earners. I quote:

> No member nation shall be asked or required to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

But, Mr. President, another provision of this same article, article 405, provides that no member nation can be required to consent to any draft convention or legislative recommendation by the conference.

The paragraphs are not marked numerically, but counting them, and for definite designation, I say the eighth paragraph of article 405, which I have previously quoted in another connection, provides that—

> If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

Manifestly, therefore, it is optional with any member nation of the league to adopt or reject any recommendation of the labor conference, and the word "required" in Mr. Gompers's amendment added nothing to the protection already provided for labor by the eighth paragraph of article 405.

Mr. President, I ought to say, in justice to Mr. Gompers, that I do not know, and I do not believe that any Member of the Senate has any means of informing himself, as to when the eighth paragraph of article 405 was incorporated in the treaty. It may not have been there when President Gompers offered his amendment. It may have been added. It may have been put in by the plenary session of the Paris conference, after it received the report of the legislative commission, over which Mr. Gompers presided, revised it and incorporated it in the treaty. But be that as it may, the last paragraph of article 405, which is paragraph 11, and which embodies Mr. Gompers's amendment made in the Paris legislative commission that drafted in the rough these provisions, provides that no member shall be asked or required to adopt any recommendation made by the legislative conference created by this treaty "to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned."

I have been speaking only of the effect of the word "required" in this amendment. I come now to the word "asked." Mr. Gompers's amendment prohibits the labor conference from even making recommendations that shall lessen the protection afforded to any member nation by its existing legislation. The very first words of his amendment, now the eleventh paragraph of article 405, are:

> In no case shall any member be asked * * * to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation—

And so forth.

Does this not clearly demonstrate that Mr. Gompers, enlightened by his "depressing defeats," in the long struggle before the Commission for Labor Legislation at Paris, was fearful that the permanent labor conference created by this treaty would inevitably and habitually assail the advanced position of American labor?

Manifestly he was distrustful of the labor conference, in which we would have only 4 votes to Great Britain's 24, and but 4 votes out of 128, whenever the total vote of the conference is polled.

Think of it! Four American votes contending against 124 foreign votes most regardful of foreign interests.

Hence he sought to guard the labor of this country from even an attempt to deprive it of any protective legislation which it had already secured.

And so, with that grave fear stirring within the clear brain of this veteran leader of labor, he drafted his "safeguarding" amendment, designed to prevent this labor conference from even suggesting to this Government any legislation that should deprive labor of one syllable of its hard-won existing protection.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield or will it interrupt the thread of his argument?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment.

But does it safeguard American labor from the danger of constant attack by the permanent conference which this treaty creates?

Is there not to be found, quietly tucked away among the folds of the numerous articles of Part XIII of this treaty, the deadly joker which may at any time sweep aside this "safeguard" and subject American labor to a direct attack upon its existing protective statutes?

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. However, I will take this up and go into it a little more fully later on.

Mr. KING. Then perhaps the Senator will discuss the point I have in mind?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I do not, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

First I direct attention to the self-imposed limitations of this safeguarding provision.

By its terms you will observe that it affords protection to existing legislation only; that is, legislation existing at the time this treaty goes into effect.

But it leaves wide open the door, and by implication invites attack upon any new legislation proposed to be enacted for the further improvement of labor conditions.

Again, what do the words "lessen the protection" to labor mean? Take a single illustration: Would a law preventing strikes lessen the protection to labor? There is a great diversity of opinion upon that subject. Labor contends that such a law would put the wage earner in chains. Capital, as represented by Mr. Gary and his associates, claims that the result of such a law would ultimately afford labor greater protection, and this Congress is now asked to pass a law taking from one of the greatest and strongest labor organizations of the country—the railroad brotherhoods—the right to strike. So it is with the question of collective bargaining, with the right of labor to have some voice in fixing the wages to be paid in the industry in which it is engaged, and so it is with every one of the many measures now being brought forward by one side or the other dealing with the labor question. Neither side admits that the measures it champions will lessen the protection to labor, but each claims that it will increase such protection.

Now, sir, without this treaty and the labor provisions of it, who would determine whether proposed legislation lessened the protection which labor enjoyed under existing law? It would be determined by the Congress and the President as provided in the Constitution. It would be debated in open session of the House and Senate. It would undoubtedly become an issue in national campaigns. All sides would be heard, and eventually the people of the United States would decide it.

By the provision of article 423 of these labor articles, however, this whole matter is taken out of the hands of the people of the United States and is to be decided by whom? By an institution to be established by the league of nations, in which our vote and our influence represents a hopeless minority, and that institution is called the permanent court of international justice.

Listen to the language of article 423, Part XIII:

> Any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of this part of the present treaty—

What part? Part XIII, which contains the 40 labor articles—

> Any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of this part of the present treaty or of any subsequent convention concluded by the members in pursuance of the provisions of this part of the present treaty shall be referred for decision to the permanent court of international justice.

From this court there is no appeal. It would decide whether any recommendation lessens the protection afforded to labor by existing legislation in this country.

Now, then, suppose that a draft convention is adopted by the conference and the delegates from the United States raise the question that it will lessen the protection afforded by our existing laws to labor, and as such they shall not be required to ask our Government to adopt it. What is the result? The answer is plain, for we solemnly agree, if we ratify these provisions as drawn, that a tribunal not of our own choosing, the permanent court of international justice, shall settle that question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that article 423, should it become operative, will deprive the Supreme Court of the United States and other tribunals of the constitutional right and duty of determining the constitutionality or the legality of laws affecting the people of this country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I raise that question in the course of my discussion, and I think it is one of the gravest questions with which the Senate is confronted in connection with the provisions of the treaty now under discussion.

Mr. THOMAS. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We are on very dangerous ground here; dangerous from the point of view of those who believe that labor already has too much, dangerous from the point of view of those who believe that labor is entitled to still further safeguards of its rights. So that from whichever side of opinion the Senators may be led to view this question, it behooves us to consider here, as solemnly as any phase of this treaty, the labor sections of the treaty and the position in which it will inevitably put us. We are bound to remember that effect of these labor articles will be felt all through our industrial life.

I now pass to a consideration of the representation of the various nations in the General Conference.

It has been stated that each nation will have four delegates in the conference. That is true, subject to one exception. The British Empire will have 24 delegates in the conference. The Empire will have 4 votes on its own account and each of the self-governing colonies which go to make up the Empire, namely, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India, will have 4 more votes each. In addition to these 24 votes it is also fair to assume that Great Britain will exert some measure of control over the 4 votes of Hedjaz.

The President, in his attempt to explain Great Britain's preponderance of power in the league of nations, has been quoted as saying that while she would have six votes in the assembly, she would, like the United States, have but one on the council, and that the assembly is merely an "influential debating society."

This "explanation," from which I wholly dissent, is certainly not applicable to the situation presented in the General Conference. The General Conference created by the labor provisions of this treaty is more than a mere "debating society." It has full power, and is created for the express purpose of taking action which will ultimately and profoundly affect every workingman and woman in the world—and there is nothing in the peace treaty making its action subject to the revision of the council.

Hence the preponderance of British strength in the conference, in which she will have 24 and possibly 28 votes, while the United States and every other nation will have 4, must be considered.

But simply to say that Great Britain will enter the conference with six or seven times the number of votes of any other State would be falling short of the truth. Because she has a large block of votes, Great Britain will win the votes of other States to her support on every roll call—that is the practical side of having that voting strength in convention—just as States like New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, in our national conventions, by the very fact that they are strong, win additional strength through the support of small States, of inconsequential strength, which see the possibility of winning favor by adhering to the powerful.

Furthermore, in view of the present state of our international relations with Italy, Japan, and other nations, is it not possible that those countries and others like them will be more likely to vote with Great Britain than with the United States, particularly on questions of labor policy, in which their standards are nearer those of Great Britain than our own?

Mr. President, I impute bad motives to no nation; but all nations will be influenced by self-interest.

Should an occasion arise in the General Conference in which the interests of Great Britain and those of the United States were in conflict—and no Senator will deny a multitude of such occasions are likely to arise—I assume that Great Britain will choose to serve her own interests rather than those of the United States.

Mr. President, it is generally conceded, I believe, that the industrial and commercial strength of a nation, and its ability to compete with other nations for the world's trade, depends, in the final analysis, upon the intelligence and skill of its workmen.

The intelligence and skill of the workmen, in turn, depend to a large extent upon their standard of living; that is, the conditions of labor under which they work.

Assume that the General Conference has under consideration a proposal affecting the conditions of labor in the United States. Assume that the proposed recommendation or draft convention has for its object the improvement of conditions of labor in this country, and hence the strengthening of this Nation as a competitor for the world's trade. Is it not conceivable that Great Britain, as the leading competitor of the United States, might withhold its support from such a provision? Is it not, indeed, conceivable that she might lend her support to provisions which would gradually undermine the present supremacy of this country in the conditions afforded our workers—all perfectly in accord, mark you, with the ultimate aim stated in the labor articles of the proposed treaty: The securing of "fair and humane" conditions of labor throughout the world and the making of those conditions uniform?

Another feature of the make-up of the General Conference is noteworthy.

In choosing its representatives, each nation is required to name one delegate representing the workers, one representing the employers, and two representing the Government as such.

We have just witnessed the gathering of a conference to consider these important questions organized somewhat upon those lines, and we have witnessed the disaster which resulted from it.

I am going to assume now that those selected representing the public interest will be neutral as between labor and capital, though I think that is a pretty strong assumption in the face of some experiences we have had lately. In the case of a delegation selected by the President composed of members supposed to represent the public interest who have affiliations with the United States Steel Trust and with the great centralized monopolies of the country, I question just a wee bit whether they would be absolutely neutral as between labor and capital; but I start out on that assumption for a hypothetical case that I am going to present to the Senate. Let us assume the facts justify the assumption that the Government delegates from the United States will be neutral; but will the Imperial Government of Japan, in which country labor has few rights and practically no organization, select delegates who will be fair and impartial in their attitude toward labor? Will the Government delegates appointed for Belgium, Portugal, or Italy be amenable to the influence of the workers of their lands or to the influence of the bankers, exporters, and the powerful few of their respective countries? Is it not likely, in fact, that even the delegates selected to represent labor in many of the nations which will be members of the league will be subject to the latter influences? I am unable to understand by what system of interpretation or by what method of logic the advocates of this treaty contend that the labor delegate from the United States will be given an intelligent and sympathetic hearing in the General Conference. On the contrary, it is my earnest conviction that the American delegates to the conference provided for under this treaty, like the American delegates on the commission which framed this section of the treaty at Paris, will find themselves perpetually in a hopeless minority, unable to secure the passage of measures they believe to be beneficial and unable to prevent the adoption of measures they believe to be injurious.

I have said that no labor leaders in this country have claimed for this section of the treaty that it is likely to benefit labor in this country. The President, however, has predicted that American labor will reap many benefits from its adoption, and many Senators, taking literally the prophesy of the Chief Executive, have expressed fear lest these betterments should be of such magnitude that they should smack of the forbidden fruit of Bolshevism. After studying the make-up of the General Conference, and after considering the fact that the United States will be represented in the conference by only 4 votes out of a total voting strength of 128 votes, I neither join in the prophesy of the President nor share in the fear of certain Members of the Senate.

And I am strengthened in my independent judgment when I contemplate this possibility: Suppose the conference should adopt a recommendation or convention regarded as a boon to labor, and if such action should be made effective by legislation or ratification, labor in this country would have no redress in case such beneficent measures were not enforced. It is provided by articles 409 and 410 that labor organizations may protest against such nonenforcement, but the publication of the complaint and of the explanation of the defaulting Government, made in answer to the complaint, is the only "redress" provided for labor.

In marked contrast to this provision of the treaty, granting to labor the mere shadow of redress in case of injury suffered, is the opportunity afforded to other nations, when their own selfish interests dictate, to hold the United States to strict compliance with the provisions of draft conventions when once ratified by this Government.

I have already called attention to article 411, which provides that "any of the members shall have the right to file a complaint with the International Labor Office if it is not satisfied that any other member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with the foregoing articles."

I have referred to the fact that a commission of inquiry, composed of three representatives of foreign nations, may, at its discretion, call upon every member of the league to enforce measures of an "economic character" against any defaulting nation. The only appeal from the action of the commission of inquiry lies to the court of international justice, and from the decision of this court there is no appeal.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the dangerous possibilities wrapped up in this proceeding.

A hypothetical situation, which might easily arise, brings home the full effect of this provision.

Suppose that a Democratic administration in this country should ratify a draft convention of the General Conference which took from labor the unrestricted right to strike. Assume that the workers of this Nation immediately inaugurated a campaign which ended in driving from power the Democratic administration that approved that legislation. Assume that the Republicans were given control of the Government. If that Republican administration, elected by the people of the United States upon this issue, then refused to enforce the provisions of the convention, any foreign Government might thereupon file a complaint against our Government, and by the economic penalties provided in this treaty force the United States to comply with the provisions of the convention against the will of the American people as expressed at the polls.

To those Senators who would welcome a law restricting labor's use of the strike let me suggest that this situation would hold equally true if the law in question dealt with an entirely different subject in a manner entirely distasteful to them.

My point is that, regardless of the particular law involved, this article of the treaty not only takes from the American people the right to determine what laws they shall have upon their statute books, but by giving to an extranational authority the right to enforce laws within our territory it strikes at the heart of our sovereignty as a Nation.

Chief Justice John Marshall, in the case of Schooner v. McFadden (7 Cranch, 116, 136), delivered an opinion peculiarly applicable to this situation. He said:

The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction and in investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction. All exception, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.

Mr. President, this whole international structure is so obviously beyond the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States, which granted certain powers to the Government and expressly reserved all power not so delegated to the States and to the people, that I shall not dwell upon that phase of the subject. But the extent to which this provision of the treaty conflicts with our Constitution is startling. Imagine a situation in which the United States Senate should ratify a draft convention affecting labor policies in the United States. If the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that such action was unconstitutional, and if a member of the league of nations which had joined with us in the convention should, nevertheless, insist upon our enforcing its provisions, we would then be confronted with the alternative of abandoning our Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court or suffering the economic penalties which would immediately become operative against us.

I am impressed with another phase of this section of the treaty which is alien to the principles of democratic government.

These two international bodies—the General Conference and the Governing Body of the International Labor Office—will be free from any sort of democratic control. Unless our whole system of government by election is based upon a misconception, these two bodies will be unresponsive to the will of the people, and therefore ready instruments for oppressing the people.

The General Conference will be made up entirely of delegates selected by appointment, in which an arbitrary number of delegates will represent each nation, irrespective of population—Siam, Hedjaz, Portugal, and countries of similar size having equal representation with the United States. The Governing Body will be even further removed from the people. Its members will be chosen by the delegates in the conference, this selection constituting a redelegation of delegated power. The physical inaccessibility of these two bodies, meeting at Geneva, far removed from the masses of the population of the nations for whom they will legislate, intensifies their undemocratic character.

The possibility of labor actually initiating legislation under such circumstances is well-nigh hopeless. Labor delegates in the conference will even be denied the opportunity of bringing up pressing problems for consideration. The Governing Body, be it remembered, prepares the agenda for the conference. Should a delegate in the conference choose to have other matters included in the program of the conference, he must first muster a two-thirds vote of the conference; and it is then provided, under article 402, that "that subject shall be included in the agenda for the following meeting."

Thus labor, dissatisfied with the agenda prepared by the Governing Body, will be powerless to secure prompt consideration on even the most pressing matters.

Mr. President, I come now to section 2, article 427, of the portion of the treaty devoted to labor.

This section has been referred to by the President as "labor's charter." In my judgment, this portion of the treaty sheds a flood of light upon the whole scheme for regulating labor conditions throughout the world, and indicates the impossibility of reconciling such an undemocratic scheme with American principles.

With such broad grants of power as I have indicated, we might expect here, as in the Constitution of the United States, a "charter" or "bill of rights" limiting the abuse of that power and boldly proclaiming the inherent rights which must be reserved unimpaired to the working people of the world, and which must be taken as the first premise in any system of regulation.

But in this section of the treaty I find nothing remotely suggesting the Bill of Rights of the American Constitution.

In this section of the treaty, purporting to protect the interests of the working men and women of the world—which, of course, embraces the great mass of humanity—there is no provision that slavery shall not exist. On the contrary, such an article was voted down by the commission which framed this portion of the treaty.

There is nothing in these articles which recognizes the unqualified right of labor to organize and to make that organization effective by the legitimate use of its industrial weapon, the strike.

There is nothing in these articles insuring to the worker the rights of free speech, a free press, and the right of free assemblage, without which he is helpless.

Were these fundamental human rights omitted because they were taken for granted as the rights of free labor, or because the commission which drafted the labor articles did not feel that they could with propriety be included in such a charter?

No; quite the contrary. Mr. President, they were left out as a matter of principle by those who were framing this document as we have it in its final form. They were deliberately rejected when the Commission on International Labor Legislation, which drafted this portion of the treaty, refused to accept these fundamental declarations of rights when proposed by the American delegates to that body.

Oh, sir, that fact ought to proclaim to Senators here and to the workers of the United States in every field of industry the danger of binding up their interests with any body of superior voting strength and power representing the same strong foreign governments which rejected these elementary principles of freedom.

This commission met at Paris as a part of the peace conference. It was composed of two representatives from each of the five great powers and five representatives elected by the other nations represented at the peace table.

That is the body of men who drafted the labor provisions of this treaty, the so-called "charter of liberty" for labor. They passed their work on to the peace conference which, in plenary session, made some further changes in it, and it comes here as they left it.

Now, let us see what took place. I think it is all very instructive. I think it forecasts what is likely to take place in the permanent labor conference to be erected by this peace treaty if it is ratified.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Mr. H. M. Robinson, acting for President E. N. Hurley, of the American Shipping Board, were the representatives of the United States appointed by the President on this commission.

I quote the "Bill of Rights" offered by the American delegation for adoption by the commission on international labor legislation:

The high contracting parties declare that in all States the following principles should be recognized, established, and maintained:

1. That in law and in practice it should be held that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce.

2. That involuntary servitude should not exist except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

3. The right of free association, free assembly, free speech, and free press should not be denied or abridged.

4. That the seamen of the merchant marine shall be guaranteed the right of leaving their vessels when the same are in safe harbor.

5. That no article or commodity should be shipped or delivered in international commerce in the production of which children under the age of 16 years have been employed or permitted to work.

6. That no article or commodity should be shipped or delivered in international commerce in the production of which convict labor has been employed or permitted.

7. It should be declared that the workday in industry and commerce should not exceed eight hours a day, except in case of extraordinary emergency, such as danger to life or to property.

8. It should be declared that an adequate wage should be paid for labor performed, a wage based upon and commensurate with a standard of life conforming to the civilization of the time.

9. That equal wages should be paid to women for equal work performed.

10. That the sale or use for commercial purposes of articles made or manufactured in private homes should be prohibited.

Was this draft proposed by the American delegates as a bill of rights written into the peace treaty? It was not. The fight which was waged over this section of the treaty marked the first conflict between American principles and the Old World conception of the rights of labor, which will dominate the General Conference and outvote the United States in that General Conference just as our delegates were outvoted in the Commission on International Labor Legislation at the Paris conference.

With Samuel Gompers presiding over the Commission on International Labor Legislation, and with the representatives of but 10 nations to contend against, the Americans were beaten on every important point for which they fought.

In his report to the thirty-ninth annual convention at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 20, 1919, Mr. Gompers described the struggle. He said:

The contest that I had to make and felt impelled to make was one of the most depressing, and was almost crushing in character. * * *

Now, I can say this to you, that I was never placed in all my life in such an awkward and uncomfortable position as I was for nine-tenths of the time that I was presiding over the International Commission on Labor Legislation. I was elected by unanimous vote to its presidency, and immediately found myself in a minority, a minority upon nearly every proposition that I had submitted. * * * We had 37 sessions, lasting from four to six hours and sometimes longer. Presiding there, fighting there, opposed and defeated in nearly every proposition that I had submitted, where the recognition of labor would be greater than was accepted by these other delegates, I found myself continually depressed, though fighting on and on until the last moment.

The rejection of the bill of rights submitted by Mr. Gompers and his colleague, Mr. Robinson, in the Paris convention is a matter of history.

The second principle, the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States—prohibiting human slavery—was stricken out, the Right Hon. G. N. Barnes, M. P., the British representative, leading the opposition.

The third principle, guaranteeing the right of "free association, free assembly, free speech, and free press," was also defeated.

The fourth principle, emancipating seamen from involuntary servitude, as passed by the Congress of the United States in the seamen's act, was promptly voted down.

Mr. McCORMICK. Upon British initiative?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; upon British initiative. The United States and Cuba voted for the American principle. All the other delegates, under the leadership of Great Britain, voted against it.

Mr. FRANCE. May I ask the Senator whether the clause relating to a free press and free speech was cut out at the instance of this Government?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was presented by the delegates from this Government, who strongly supported it.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is there any record to show upon the initiative of what power the rights of assembly and association and of free speech were stricken out?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not in possession of any, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, but I am assured of my facts in stating that Great Britain led the fight against many of the provisions that the United States delegates to the legislative commission proposed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may ask the question, does the Senator get his information from the address of Mr. Gompers?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I get it in part from the address of Mr. Gompers, and I get it from others who were present during the sessions of the Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking the question, because I presume that the Senator has made an attempt, at least, to get what happened before the particular organization that framed this part of the treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have made that effort.

Mr. NORRIS. Was the Senator able to get a copy of the minutes or of the records in any way?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, indeed, Mr. President. We are denied the records with respect to any provisions of this treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. I know we have been denied information as to other provisions, but I was wondering if there was any way in which publicity could be given to what actually took place. It seems to me the question suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] is very pertinent; that is, who initiated the objection to and opposed putting into this particular part of the treaty the provision in regard to free speech and a free press, that most people everywhere in civilization regard as one of the fundamental corner stones of human liberty. It would be interesting to the entire world if we could know just what that discussion was and through what influences that provision was kept out of the treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would be very, very interesting, Mr. President; just as it would be interesting for us to know, and as I think it is vital for us to know, to what extent we are committing ourselves in voting for or against the provisions of this treaty without having before us all of the minutes showing the interpretation put upon the different provisions of the treaty by those who made it, and without having the many agreements that are related to the treaty we are being driven to pass upon, some of which are being made as we sit in session here now.

With reference to the matters connected with the sessions of the legislative commission that framed this first draft, I have been compelled to forage in such communiqués as were given out; I have been compelled to resort to the newspapers and the magazines, and even to get such assistance as I could from personal reports of those who were in Paris at the time, and who were either in the commission itself or in constant interchange of information with those who were in the commission. So that so far as I state any facts here, I have verified the accuracy of them and give them upon my own responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not question the Senator's statement. I do not want the Senator to get that idea. I did not doubt but what he had verified every statement he made; but it seemed to me it would be enlightening and throw a flood of light on this question if there were any way by which we could have complete publicity of the discussions that took place and have publicity in regard to the representatives of the various nations who prevented, for instance, the adoption of the clause providing for free speech and a free press.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator commenced his discussion of these various propositions, as I understood him, with No. 2. I was wondering if he was going to say anything about the first. I am anxious to know how it happened that the particular language was used that "labor should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall come to that, and account for that a little further on.

I think I had stated, Mr. President, that the third principle, guaranteeing the right of free association and free assembly, free speech, and a free press, was also defeated.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator referred to that, and I got the idea that he or the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] said that the principle which the Senator has just now stated had only two votes, and that they came from our country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to give the number of affirmative votes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it true that the opposition to putting that clause in was led by the representatives of Great Britain?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. NORRIS. I have heard that statement made. I do not know whether it is true or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know that the opposition to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution as one of the declarations of the bill of rights was led by the British representative.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the provision in regard to slavery?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. The opposition was led by Mr. Barnes.

The provisions against sweatshop labor and convict labor were rejected. The article providing that children should not be employed under the age of 16 years was changed by this commission to apply to children under the "age of 14 years." I will state shortly what ultimately happened to that provision after it got into the plenary session of the peace conference.

Thus, mangled and torn, stripped of their most vital clauses, the American principles finally emerged from the hands of the commission ready to be submitted at the plenary session of the peace conference.

The American labor representatives meanwhile left Paris. In the absence of Mr. Gompers and the other American labor delegates, who had fought desperately for the American principles, the commission was again called into session, and the sole article which the Americans had succeeded in putting through unimpaired was mutilated and robbed of its force. On motion of the British delegates, acting at the suggestion of Sir Robert Borden, premier of Canada, the word "merely" was inserted in the first article of the "charter." As adopted after the prolonged fight waged by Mr. Gompers the article had read, "Labor should not be considered a commodity or article of commerce."

That is as Mr. Gompers proposed it. But after Mr. Gompers and his associates had left Paris, and after they supposed the work of the commission was concluded, it was again brought together, and in their absence it was amended, and as amended by the commission, after the departure of Mr. Gompers, the article was made to read:

Labor should not be considered merely a commodity—

And so forth.

This change negatived the whole meaning of the article and if accepted by the United States in this treaty will supersede the principle adopted in the Clayton Act.

The commission's draft of the labor articles was submitted to the plenary session of the peace conference and adopted April 28, 1919.

Mr. KENYON. Before the Senator gets away from that, does the Senator know why the word "merely" was put in; why that principle which we have enunciated here in statutes was not carried out?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Only by inference. The Senator will have to draw his conclusion, as I draw mine. Of course, it would have been actually better to leave it all out than to have put it in with that qualification.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, that is a statement of fact—that it is a commodity of commerce.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

I come now to what the plenary session of the peace conference, of which the President was a member, did to this charter for labor after it got into its hands.

The plenary session went even further than the commission in rejecting the American principles. After accepting, in substance, the draft offered by the commission, the plenary council took the real heart from the child-labor article by striking out the definite age limit of 14 years set by the commission.

As proposed by our delegates, Senators will remember, this article fixed the age limit at 16 years. The legislative commission reduced it to 14 years, and passed it on to the plenary session of the peace conference, of which the President was a member, and there they wiped out the age limit altogether.

With these changes the "labor charter" was written into the peace treaty—and there it stands to-day, shorn of every American principle and falling short in every one of its nine articles of the rights long since won, and enjoyed to-day, by American workmen.

Finally, Mr. President, we find this "charter" preceded by a preamble, which makes it plain that the ultimate object of the labor section of this treaty is to secure "uniformity in the conditions of labor" throughout the world.

By ratifying this treaty we pledge our aid in working toward that uniformity on the alien principles set forth in this charter.

I am not willing to exchange for this charter, glittering with ornamental and seductive phrases, but lacking the virtue of plain and honest statement, the bold assertion of human rights embodied in the Constitution of the United States. I am not willing to exchange the common heritage of American citizens, won more than a century and a quarter ago, and since augmented and preserved at the cost of infinite effort and sacrifice, for a charter which expressly denies those human rights and stands in this treaty a monument to the defeat of American principles at Paris.

Mr. President, what is the broad significance of these labor provisions?

The practical effect of setting up international machinery of this kind is to crystallize the present industrial conditions and to perpetuate the wrong and injustice in the present relation existing between labor and capital.

As a substitute for natural evolution, which over a period of centuries has been bringing more and more recognition of the rights of labor, this treaty of peace sets up an arbitrary, artificial organization, clothed with definite powers and restricted by vague limitations, which has for its ultimate object the maintenance of the present system of a completely centralized control of industry. As stated in the preamble of the so-called "labor charter," varying conditions throughout the world make "strict uniformity in the conditions of labor difficult of immediate attainment"—but uniformity is the ultimate aim.

In working toward uniformity, there will be a general leveling process, which will inevitably destroy this country's present position of leadership in the struggle to gain further advantages for the great mass of workers.

It is my conviction that such a body as the General Conference, undemocratic as I have shown it to be, and with no direct contact with the masses of the people, armed with the immense prestige and moral force of international authority, will lay a restraining hand upon any efforts which may be made in America and elsewhere in the interests of the workers.

I am aware that the American Federation of Labor, meeting a few weeks after the adoption of the labor articles at Paris, gave its indorsement to the treaty, upon the appeal of Mr. Gompers.

But Mr. Gompers before the American Federation of Labor had been placed by the President in much the same position as the United States Senate, where the whole treaty as brought back from Paris must be accepted or the gravest responsibilities assumed in rejecting it.

In the adoption of this section of the treaty as it stands there is at least one source of immediate menace.

Mr. President, should labor in this country contend for a new concession, and by educating public opinion make it possible to secure action from Congress, will not the fight be carried by the opposition into the General Conference set up by this treaty?

Take, for example, the seamen's act, which was passed by Congress after 21 years of agitation.

This act, on the face of it, affects every nation in the world directly or indirectly, and since its passage in 1915 our State Department has been urged by Great Britain to alter its provisions or to curtail its enforcement.

I am tempted, of course, to turn aside and to lay before the Senate at this moment the tremendous benefits being wrought out month by month for the advancement of a merchant marine that will put America in the front rank of the maritime nations of the world, but I content myself with saying that many of the then strongest opponents of the seamen's act are now among its strongest advocates. I bring it forward as an illustration of what will happen to any suggestion for advanced legislation which directly or indirectly affects labor.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question? I listened with the greatest interest to his speech until I was necessarily called out of the Chamber, at the time he was discussing the last clause of article 405, providing that—

> In no case shall any member be asked or required, as the result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

I did not understand if the Senator indicated whether the words "existing legislation" had reference to legislation in existence at the time of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty or legislation existing at the time the proposition affecting workers might have been created. I am very anxious to know what the Senator's view is on that point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is my opinion that it would clearly mean legislation existing at the time of the exchange of the ratification of the treaty. That, I believe, would fix the interpretation of that provision. I should be very glad indeed to have the opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania upon that subject.

Mr. KNOX. Unfortunately the Senator from Pennsylvania has not given this clause of the treaty the thought and study that the Senator from Wisconsin has given to it. I am only anxious to obtain the Senator's view; that is all. I have no disposition to challenge it in any respect.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; I understood.

Mr. KNOX. I can see that there can be much said in favor of the proposition, although I am frank to say that I can see something to be said upon the other side.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may be true. I present it as the matter appears to me. I may be in error about it, but be that as it may, it would still operate as a limitation.

If the seamen's act were introduced to-day, it would, in all probability, be referred to the General Conference, there to be considered by the representatives of thirty-odd nations.

Organized labor of America would then have the task of educating these representatives, acting for nations which are commercial competitors of the United States, and who would not be blind to the fact that the seamen's act would result, as it already has, in the building up of a merchant marine as an additional commercial advantage to this country or in advancing very rapidly along that course.

I am reminded, Senators, of the history of one phase of the long struggle to secure the seamen's act. That struggle began in 1894 and extended over a period of some 21 years. When it seemed that ultimate success was to come as a result of that long and persistent campaign, those who were opposed to the passage of the seamen's law brought about very much such an international conference, as is proposed here, as means of preventing that legislation in this country.

One of the high officials of this Government, who had through several administrations been the chief obstacle to the passage of the seamen's act—I refer to Mr. Chamberlain, Commissioner of Navigation—was instrumental in bringing about what was known as an "International Conference for Safety of Human Life at Sea," which was held in London. It assembled, I think, in November, 1913. In October, 1913, we had passed the seamen's act through the Senate. It was morally certain that it would become a law. It had been passed, though not in its present form, during the Taft administration, and suffered a pocket veto. But when the opponents of the seamen's act foresaw that they would be defeated and that the law would be written upon the statute books, they set in motion the machinery for an international conference. They knew that Great Britain would dominate that conference. They knew that she was opposed to the seaman's bill. And they relied upon that conference to make recommendations which would be prejudicial to the passage of the seamens' act in this country. That is precisely what happened. In the closing hours of the Congress, which terminated on the 4th of March, 1913, there was an intense struggle by the opponents of the seamen's act, who sought to push the London conference treaty through the Senate and have it ratified before the seamen's act could be passed and reach the President for his approval, and it was only by the accidental fact that a quorum was absent at a time when the treaty might possibly have been concurred in that the seamen's bill passed Congress and was approved by the President before any action was had upon the London treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That was 1913, was it not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator said 1915. I thought it was 1913. The pact of London was before the war.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It was 1913.

Mr. LA FOLLLETTE. Yes; certainly. It was 1913.

Is it contended that the 24 delegates of Great Britain would join with the 4 delegates from the United States in support of such a measure?

Indeed, it is not possible, with the seamen's act already on our statute books, that the General Conference may take action which will restrict its operation? The friends of the seamen's act in the United States, after spending 21 years in securing its adoption, and after seeing the Commission on International Labor Legislation reject the principle of the act, although it had the indorsement of American labor, fear just this contingency.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the interests of the millions of men and women in industry are endangered by the provisions of the labor articles. But the effect of these articles does not stop with one class of our population. This section of the treaty, if it is accepted by the Senate as it stands, will profoundly affect our fundamental political institutions, and through them its influence will be felt by every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the interpretation of the labor provisions of the treaty, no man can deny: The labor articles of this treaty set up an international legislative body, undemocratic in character, which has broad power to reach out into the internal affairs of this country, and which would be able to mass the weight of aggregate world pressure behind its program of legislation and write that program into our statutes against the unorganized will of the American people. I mean by that that the weight of the recommendation of the international body brought to bear upon Congress itself might be the means of putting through legislation against the will of the American people.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Speaking of friends of the seamen's act, I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I had the privilege of listening to an address made by Mr. John H. Rossiter, who, I understand, is one of the men best qualified to speak upon the question of shipping. He stated that the seamen's act met with his unqualified approval. He said it was indispensable to the success of American shipping. So it is not only labor, I will say to the Senator, that begins to recognize what the seamen's act is doing not only for labor but for those who have their money invested in shipping.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota to state, in that connection, what interests Mr. Rossiter represents and what his standing is in the world of commerce.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Rossiter was a member of the Shipping Board during the war, as I understand it. He is manager of large shipping interests on the Pacific coast. I have been told that he is one of the best—if not the best—posted men of the world on the question of shipping. They have hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the business of shipping.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, if it is not a fact that Mr. Rossiter, like a great many others of those who represent large investments in steamship lines, was originally very much opposed to the seamen's act?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I will ask the Senator if he made any statement in that connection touching that point?

Mr. GRONNA. He went into detail and stated that before the bill was passed he was very much opposed to it; but, after having seen what the law has accomplished for our merchant marine, he has changed his mind. He now says he is willing to go further than the La Follette Seamen's Act goes, and that the law is not only in the interest of labor but it is in the interest of American shipping. I am simply bringing this to the attention of the Senate, because I know it has often been argued here that the law was detrimental to the American shipping industry.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator from North Dakota for making that contribution.

Mr. President, in our modern era of a highly organized industrial society, the movement for democracy in industry is tending to supersede at many points the old struggle for political democracy.

Competition between business men and manufacturers, which tended to lower prices and increase wages, has wholly disappeared. All the basic industries of the Nation and most of the subordinate industries have passed into the control of small groups of men. Their power is absolute, and they increase prices and lower actual wages at will.

The great mass of the people, meanwhile, have become wage earners, employed in industry. With these fundamental changes, the battle line in the struggle runs through the industrial life of the entire Nation.

By the labor section of this treaty we are giving to an international body—a superlegislature—an entering wedge through which it may intervene in the settlement of our industrial affairs.

At the very point where the fight for real democracy is most heated, where action is fraught with the most vital consequences to the mass of the American people, the treaty sets up an international body which has full authority and power to act.

Mr. President, I can not consent to that grant of authority and power. Believing, as I do, in democratic principles; believing that the best results in legislation and government are obtained when those who legislate are in closest touch with, and elected directly by, the people; believing, in other words, in the wisdom of the principles written into the American Constitution, which must be preserved if we are to save our free institutions; believing, finally, that America's best gift to the world and most effective aid to the cause of labor throughout the world would be the example of the perfection of our own democracy, unhampered and unrestrained by outside influences; believing, sir, these things, I shall move to strike out the labor articles of this treaty.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything upon this amendment, but I feel so strongly upon the subject that I am going to occupy the time of the Senate briefly with no prepared speech, but to offer a few remarks emphasizing some of the things I have said heretofore in the Senate.

The question now at issue, as to the equal voting powers or privileges of the nations under the proposed league of nations, is one of the concrete questions proving, to my mind, the classification of the character of the treaty which we are requested to enter into, and by its very nature emphasizing the conclusion at which I long since arrived, that the Senate has no power whatsoever to enter upon this treaty at all; that the President had no power or authority to negotiate it; that it is unconstitutional; and that if it comes before the Supreme Court of the United States in any of its phases, as inevitably it will, it will be so declared, in my judgment.

I have made an attempt at a legal argument upon this proposition once before. I do not intend to rehearse or rehash what I said at that time, but merely to call attention to the line of argument and the conclusions which I drew.

I called attention at that time to the fact that under the articles of confederation we had entered into two treaties, known as the treaties with France, the one a treaty of amity and commerce and the other a mutual treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive. I called attention to the fact that trouble had arisen over these treaties prior to the action of the Constitutional Convention framing the Constitution under which this treaty is now submitted for the consideration of the Senate.

Of course when I use the word "treaty" here, I refer to the entire instrument, including the covenant of the league of nations, and it is to that portion of the treaty that I am directing my remarks.

I then called attention to the historical fact that already, under the declarations of Washington, as shown in his letters to Pinckney and to Henry when he asked Henry to take the position of Secretary of State after the resignation of Randolph, and under the declarations of our other statesmen of that time, we were entering upon the American policy of "no entangling alliances."

I called attention to the fact that by Article IX of the Articles of Confederation it was specifically provided that the United States of America could enter into treaties, compacts, and "alliances."

I then called attention to the fact that in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States the States are prohibited from entering into treaties, compacts, and "alliances."

I called attention at that time to the fact that there were different classifications of treaties laid down by all the writers upon the subject.

I called to your attention the fact that the international law writer of all ages, Vattel, was a contemporary of Thomas Jefferson, who knew him in Paris. You will find Vattel referred to and cited again and again in Jefferson's works, as you will find citations to him as an admitted authority in the declarations upon international law of practically every father of this country.

Vattel had commented upon all the works on international law issued up to his day. He is a recognized authority now in every civilized country upon the globe upon international legal propositions. Jefferson, as I understand, knew him personally, and, as his writings, letters, and speeches show, he read him constantly and relied upon him.

I then commented upon the fact that, excluding the definitions which had been given by Article IX of the Articles of Confederation and excluding the definition in the limitation upon the power of the States, the people of the United States empowered the President of the United States and the Senate to enter into treaties.

I called attention at that time to the classifications of treaties, those based upon natural law or the law of necessity in human affairs and international affairs, and the other classes of treaties promising future things to be done by one nation with the other. This classification was well understood by those who wrote the words into this Constitution. I was and have been surprised, I may say, in private conferences with Senators, to learn that the distinction which the fathers had in mind when they wrote this Constitution, in my judgment, founded upon my reading of history and my construction of the words used by them, has not been understood at all by various of the Senators here. For that reason, to make my purpose clear, as I simply drew conclusions and stated facts without quotations, I propose to occupy a few moments more of the time of the Senate in attempting to clarify the statements which I made, to the understanding of others who apparently have not understood what I meant.

I referred to Vattel. I have referred to the fact, and I refer to it again and ask you to bear it in mind, that Vattel was the author upon whom the fathers relied with reference to definitions of international law, and to the law itself, when they were considering it.

Vattel points out—and I am going to quote from him, quoting and following Grotius—the distinction which I then had reference to, and which I desire now to impress, for the purposes of the present and of the then argument. He says:

> Grotius divides treaties into two general classes, first, those which turn merely on things to which the parties were already bound by the law of nature. * * * By the former—

That is, the first, which he is defining—

> we acquire a perfect right to things to which we before had only an imperfect right, so that we may thenceforward demand as our due what before we could only request as an office of humanity. Such treaties * * * are useful * * * in order the better to secure the succors they may expect—to determine the measure and degree of those succors, and to show on what they have to depend—to regulate what can not in general be determined by the law of nature, and thus to obviate all difficulties by providing against the various interpretations of that law. * * * To this first class belong all simple treaties of peace and friendship, when the engagements which we thereby contract make no addition to those duties that men owe to each other as brethren and as members of the human society. Such are those treaties that permit commerce, passage, etc.
> Secondly, in this classification—

As Vattel is explaining that made by Grotius—> those treaties by which nations enter into further engagements. Such last are either equal or unequal.

>
> Equal treaties are those in which the contracting parties promise the same things, or things that are equivalent, or, finally, things that are equitably proportioned, so that the condition of the parties is equal. Such is, for example, a defensive alliance, in which the parties reciprocally stipulate for the same succors. Such is an offensive alliance, in which it is agreed that each of the allies shall furnish the same number of vessels, the same number of troops, of cavalry, and infantry, or an equivalent in vessels, in troops, in artillery, or in money. Such is also a league in which the quota of each of the allies is regulated in proportion to the interest he takes or may have in the design of the league—

And so forth.

Mr. President, under the confederation, using the power vested in it under Article IX of the Articles of Confederation, allowing the Congress of the United States to enter into treaties, compacts, and alliances, they entered into the alliance with France which caused trouble from the moment it was entered into, or immediately after the close of the war, until the year 1798, when it was finally denounced by the Congress of the United States. These facts were known; and it was the purpose of the fathers when they wrote this Constitution, in my judgment, to prohibit this Government from entering into treaties of alliance. They understood the distinction, as Vattel and Grotius and all the writers understood it then and understand it now, between ordinary treaties defining human rights of trade, of commerce, of immigration, and matters of that kind and treaties of alliance by which one country promised under a given condition of affairs to go to the assistance of another or under which countries bound themselves mutually into a league.

In the discussion of this subject upon the former occasion to which I have referred I referred to the expressions of various of the fathers, and I quoted from Jefferson upon more than one subject; and I must say that I thought I had read practically everything Jefferson had said in all his voluminous writings, including his letters, upon this subject, but that I overlooked at that time his parliamentary manual upon the subject of the treatment of treaties in this body. My attention was called to that after I had delivered the speech. In conclusion, upon the subject of treaties, Jefferson says, as I have said, sir:

> The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe.

I said, in the conclusion of the argument which I made upon the occasion to which I have referred, that this treaty which we are now required to enter into was a treaty classified by the law writers as an "unequal treaty with sovereignty impaired."

Mr. President, I undertook at that time to make a further distinction. I referred then to the article of the Constitution concerning the power of the Supreme Court of the United States, and referring to the Constitution "the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution" and treaties entered into by "authority" of the United States.

I do not agree fully with Mr. Tucker, eminent lawyer as he was, in the argument which he has made, and which has been followed, as you all well know, by very many eminent lawyers in this country, that under no circumstances could the United States cede any portion of her territory. I think, sir, as I thought when I made the first argument upon the constitutionality of this instrument in this body, that "in extremis," if conquered, beaten to our knees by some foreign country, it became necessary for this country to sue for peace, and to yield, for instance, to the British Empire a portion of the State of Vermont to secure the safety of the other States of the Union, that not under the Constitution but in violation of the fundamental laws of the land, in accord with the great law of national self-preservation, the authority of the Congress of the United States might go to the extreme of ceding a portion of the territory of the Union. I say to you now that, in my judgment, the only possible authority which you may find for entering into the treaty now before you is not under the Constitution of the United States but only to be found in the last resort of a conquered nation to save the balance of its people and of its empire.

Mr. President, are we a conquered people? We entertained on yesterday one of our allies, and we engaged in mutual congratulations based upon the fact that instead of being a conquered Nation we were the victors in the greatest war which the world has ever known, and to our part of this war is largely due the fact that victory first perched upon the banners of the Allies, and that Belgium was redeemed.

I took the position before, and listening to the month's debate I have heard no challenge to it, and I have heard no words uttered here, nor have I read the utterances of others upon that subject, which have caused me in the slightest degree to change my then opinion, that this proposed covenant of the league of nations is a delegation of authority which we have no right to make, and is unconstitutional under the Constitution of the United States.

Not conquered; and yet let us see whether the definition that I then gave is the correct definition of an "unequal alliance with sovereignty impaired."

The Senate proposes to reject the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and declare to the world that the United States is content to enter this league upon a parity with Liberia, and with the Kingdom of Great Britain exercising six times the power, through her voice and her vote, that the United States shall exercise. If there were no other objections, if there were no constitutional objections, if there were no objections resting upon policy, Mr. President, with due respect to those of my colleagues who differ from me in this matter, I say that as an American citizen I would walk out of the Senate, offering to you, sir, and telegraphing to my people, my resignation as a Senator before I would abase my Americanism by voting to reject an amendment to equalize the vote of this great Nation with the vote to be cast or the power or influence to be wielded by any other people or nation on the face of the earth. I say to you that in so voting to reject an amendment of equalization, you are voting for war and not for peace. If a peace, it is a dictated peace by Great Britain, and not an honorable peace, such as we, as equals, have always demanded and secured.

I say to you, sir, if there is Americanism left in the people of the United States, it will be only a few months until you meet this question in the conventions of the great parties, and then you will meet it upon the hustings, and those of you who vote to allow Great Britain six times the influence and six votes to our one will be explaining to your people the reason for your vote. I am not assuming to speak for the American people, but merely to voice my judgment of the genuine true American character, and if I know anything of it, they will denounce this treaty at the first opportunity if you place your seal of approval upon it, and that opportunity they will make at a very early date.

Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me how and I can not understand the process of reasoning by which an American can agree to enter into this unequal treaty, in the first place; and how he can enter into it upon unequal terms, in the second place. It is inconceivable to me that the people of the United States, in the face of the declaration which we hear every day that the other nations of the earth are bankrupt, should be led into a copartnership with seven or eight bankrupt nations for the purpose of restoring their solvency by the addition of ourselves among the number as a member of the firm, the only solvent, great, self-supporting nation upon the face of the earth to-day.

Now, Mr. President, I have nothing further to say upon the subject. I simply desired to make these citations as illustrating the argument which I made heretofore. I do not impugn the motives of any man who differs from me and votes differently from myself. It is simply a matter of impossibility for me to enter into his line of reasoning and appreciate his conclusions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] as a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	Lenroot	Sherman
Ball	Gerry	Lodge	Shields
Bankhead	Gronna	McKellar	Simmons
Borah	Hale	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Harding	McNary	Smith, Md.
Capper	Harris	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Harrison	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Henderson	New	Spencer
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Sutherland
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Swanson
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Thomas
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Page	Trammell
Edge	Kellogg	Penrose	Wadsworth
Elkins	Kendrick	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	Kenyon	Poindexter	Warren
Fernald	Keyes	Pomerene	Williams
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Wolcott
France	Knox	Robinson
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Secretary begins the calling of the roll, I should like to ask whether this is a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], or is it to be a direct vote upon the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the committee and the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee proposes to insert, on page 31, after line 8, the following words (committee amendment No. 2):

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

In lieu of those words the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] proposes to substitute the following:

Provided, That when Imperial and Federal Governments and their self-governing dominions, colonies, or States are members of the league, as originally organized, or hereafter admitted, the Empire or Federal Government and the dominions, colonies, or States shall, collectively, have only one membership, one delegate, and one vote in the council, and only three delegates and one vote in the assembly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] on this question. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea." I am unable to secure a transfer and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). On this and the succeeding vote, I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and am therefore compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote upon this amendment, and because of that fact he was at liberty to pair and did pair with his colleague. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. He has a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He is not present, and I am obliged to withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and let my vote stand.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I note that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has made a transfer of his pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I am therefore obliged to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ball	Elkins	La Follette	Penrose

So Mr. SHIELDS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to announce that I was absent at lunch, about three blocks distant, when the Senate voted on the Shields amendment, and my line of communication did not hold well. The Sergeant at Arms phoned that a vote was about to take place, but the hotel operator failed to notify me in time to appear. I would have voted against the proposed amendment had I been present. I have been consistently taking the treaty straight, and would have continued to do so on that vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment to the treaty proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that I made on the last roll call, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote relative to the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call regarding my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], I am obliged to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD'S name was called). I desire to make the same announcement in reference to my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that I made on the last roll call.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I desire to say that on this question I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If he were present, and I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—36.

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that concludes the committee amendments. The treaty is now open to amendments to be offered by individual Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I now submit an amendment which was offered by me on October 11, 1919. I wish very briefly to state that the supreme worldly self-sufficiency of the Paris conference challenges the belief of mankind in an overruling Providence. I do not wish to discuss this matter save to say that the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863 all contain reference to an overruling Providence. This document does not, either in Part I or Part II. It is the most materialistic document of a creative epoch-making form ever known to civilized mankind. The most materialistic professor in a German university could not excel the ignoring of any overruling Providence aside from the agency of men if he were to try his utmost so to do.

To correct this, and being at most but an informal amendment, so far as its legal, international, or diplomatic significance is concerned, I have offered this amendment to the preamble or introduction to the document. I ought to say that it is not my composition; it is the exact language of the closing words of the Emancipation Proclamation of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only want to add to what has been stated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] that the invocation of the blessing of the Almighty upon great public documents is not confined to documents like the Declaration of Independence but has its precedents in the great treaties of the world. One of the most humane and beneficent treaties ever negotiated between the nations was the treaty of Brussels in 1840 against the African slave trade, and the first line of that treaty was, "In the name of God Almighty."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this document is one that represents the combined wisdom of the delegation representing 27 nations. Some of these nations are composed of people who believe in that form of world religion called Christianity; some of them do not. Japan is one of the principal allied powers recently engaged in the war with Germany, and the religion of her people does not conform to that of the United States or of Great Britain or of the other principal allied powers. The great British dependency of India, composed of nearly 400,000,000 people, is not a Christian nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, there is so much noise in the Chamber that we are unable to hear the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be order in the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to assure Senators that I do not propose to indulge in any very extended remarks upon the subject of religion, which, generally speaking, is foreign to our discussions. The purpose which I have in mind is to call attention to what seems to me to be the inappropriateness of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

I can readily understand that if this treaty were a covenant between nations whose people professed belief in the Christian religion, whatever their practices may be, precedents could be found for the insertion of such a clause in the preamble. I think on several occasions in the past treaties which have been made between the United States and other Governments have been made in the name of Almighty God, or of the Holy Trinity, both, of course, representing the Deity in Christian conception. The vast number of our treaties, however, have made no reference whatever to that subject. Here, however, is a treaty which is designed to change the face of the world geographically, politically, and morally, the constituents of which represent various forms of religious belief. That fact, in my judgment, justifies the absence of such a reference in this treaty; and I can easily understand how its insertion here by way of amendment might be the cause of serious disagreement with regard to the ultimate acceptance of the document as affecting this country.

I do not think I misstate the position of the Senator from Illinois when I say that it is not his purpose to vote for the ratification of this treaty whether his amendment is adopted or not; for only a few days ago the Senator, who is always candid and courageous, declared, in substance—and if I misquote him I hope he will correct me—that he would vote for all amendments to this treaty, good, bad, or indifferent, and then, upon the final vote, he would vote to reject it. I think that is correct. Hence, even if we adopt this amendment and insert it in the treaty, it will not command an affirmative vote from the senior Senator from Illinois.

I can see nothing but trouble from the adoption of this amendment, in view of the composite religious character of the peoples composing the nations that were represented at Paris, and of whose labors this is the fruit. But, Mr. President, I want to say also that I personally oppose this amendment, because I never have believed in saddling the Almighty with responsibility for the sins and wickedness and mistakes of humankind. I do not believe that any overruling Providence is responsible for this war. If I were a believer in a personal Deity, I should have too much reverence, love, respect, and affection for Him to suppose for a moment that He was even an accessory before the fact to this terrible calamity that has afflicted the civilized world; and I am equally sure that whatever the fate of this treaty—good, bad, or indifferent—may be, should it become an established document between the nations, it will not in anywise be affected by the inclusion or the exclusion of this amendment.

Germany, from the date of her declaration of war, imposed her cause upon the Almighty, and her Kaiser associated himself with that omniscient Being in terms of full partnership. To the Allies that seemed an impious thing, and to us as well. We repudiated the possibility of any such association, because I think we instinctively recognized the fact that if there could be such responsibility, the war could have been prevented, and would have been prevented, by the interposition of the same Supreme Power; and, of course, the other nations of the earth relied with equal implicitness upon the same Divine sustenance, and looked to it with faith and with prayer for victorious deliverance from the terrible Hun. Thus the same Deity was invoked by nations believing in Him, and at war with each other, to give them His assistance and divine aid in their work of cutting each others' throats and deluging the European world with blood; and there are many devout people in the world who think that their prayers were answered, and that the result of this war was due to the prayerful persuasion of the victorious hosts of the Allies. It may be so, but I am unable to accept the conclusion.

One of the many Chinamen who were imported to France to aid in the war, upon his return home announced that he had had a good time; that for the last 18 months he had witnessed Christians cutting each others' throats; and we can imagine with what cynicism this follower of Confucius regarded the spectacle.

I shall not refer to the numerous wars which religion has provoked, and which, in their aggregate, have been the fruitful source of more bloodshed upon the battle fields of the world than any other single cause; but the same belief which inspires us inspires also those of non-Christian nations with regard to their own deities and their own professions of religion. If it be true that an extraordinary supernatural power controlled this war, was the cause of it, and directed its result, then we can not escape the conviction of cooperation to a common end between our own God and all the other gods of the non-Christian countries; and upon that assumption the recognition of but one of them in the treaty can not be construed otherwise than as a reflection upon the others.

I do not think this has any place in the treaty. I shall not detain the Senate any longer, but shall ask for a roll call upon the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume all Members of the Senate were reared in the atmosphere of Christian belief, and that in any cause in which any Member of the Senate felt a deep and an abiding interest, and wished for its success, it would be natural to invoke the presence of the Divine Being. It is very difficult to discuss this question without seeming to be satirical, but I beg the Senate to know that what I say I say in the utmost sincerity.

I would feel that if I should invoke the Divine blessing upon this treaty I would be guilty of sacrilege. It is founded in oppression. It depends and rests upon military force. If it is carried out, it will deprive millions of people of their liberty for all time to come; and in my judgment, while I know that men equally honest and sincere differ with me, if it is carried out it will destroy this Republic. I do not, therefore, propose to vote for an amendment which in any way recognizes or invokes Divine aid and agency in the execution of this kind of an instrument. From my standpoint it would be mockery.

Mr. President, look at the list of people who will survey the action of the United States Senate to-day in invoking the presence of Divine power for the successful maintenance and execution of this instrument. What will the millions in Shantung think? How will they hereafter look upon the Christian God—a god of oppression, a god which tears asunder peoples and distributes them to an enemy nation? What will the millions in Korea think? What will the people of Egypt, who have been tricked and robbed of their birthright, think?

This treaty effectuates the complete disposition of these people without their consent. It takes away the dearest rights which a people can have or enjoy upon this mundane sphere, and, if we are successful in writing into it the league of nations, we guarantee that that condition of affairs shall be eternal. We pledge the lives and the blood of generations yet to come to maintain the oppression and force which we are establishing over these subject nations. We are sending our missionaries into these countries for the purpose of teaching them the Christian religion and we write into our treaty a provision which deprives them of their rights as human beings; and now it is proposed to invoke the presence and blessings of our God. And yet we know that the people to whom we are giving dominion over the Koreans and the people of China, of Egypt, and of Ireland are persecuting and decimating those people day by day. If we are successful in writing into this treaty the covenant, we, as a Christian people, pledge ourselves to continue a status which will continue this condition of affairs.

Therefore, sir, as a believer in Christianity and accepting the divine guidance of an Omnipotent Being in the great affairs of the world, I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to invoke His seal of approval upon a conditon of affairs which, in my judgment, means the oppression of nearly one-half of the inhabitants of the globe. The attributes of the Supreme Being I have been taught from childhood to reverence are to those of justice, of freedom, and of liberty. These things are by this treaty denied to millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no pride of authorship or opinion in regard to this amendment. I have offered no amendment other than this, nor have I written any reservation. I have voted for a number of amendments and I shall vote for a variety and number of reservations, both those reported by the committee and others.

I have expressed myself as then being ready to vote to reject the treaty. I expect to do so, because I have no sovereign, abiding faith that any amendments will be adopted to remove what I consider the evil features of this document. I do not believe that even if all the reservations, the most radical in character, should be adopted, they would remove the evil contained in the league and the treaty. The adoption of those reservations will, as I have already stated, only serve, as I see it, to save us from the imputation of bad faith. As a change in any manner of the league or the treaty as adopted or ratified by the other nations of the world, it will be among them without significance or effect. Internationally, it will still be as it came from the peace conference, except as to us. I have no faith, Mr. President, in the virtue of the reservations after all these amendments may have been defeated. In that spirit I said I would vote to reject the treaty, and I expect to be compelled to do so, acting under my sense of duty.

This amendment, if adopted, would not cause the 23 nations' representatives, if assembled, any considerable difficulty in again ratifying the document with this change alone. I do not apprehend, even with the materialistic or agnostic sentiment of Germany, that she would make any vital trouble if she were again called to send her representatives to Paris to reaffirm or ratify the document as changed by this proposed amendment.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] says, with truth, that this is our expression of our belief in an overruling power. It will be noted, however, on reading the amendment, that there is no such expression as would not be applicable to the belief of any nation or any creed having a belief in an overruling Providence or a future life. It applies to and embraces other religions as well as the Christian.

I once read in an assembly of preachers of the Gospel a criticism of Bishop Newman's hymn, "Lead Kindly Light." It was said that an assembly of pagans might chant this world anthem without regard to whether they had a belief in a Christian God or not. While I was raised in a Christian community and have a Christian faith, I am not identified with any religious organization; but I express my belief in the Christian form of a reliance upon an overruling Providence. Yet, if I had supreme power in the palm of my hand, I would not oppress nor would I hamper the exercise of any person's conscience under any creed in the world if it tended to make mankind better, to preserve public peace, or promote private happiness. Only when it interferes with those beneficent ends ought any alleged religion ever to be regulated by public authority.

I believe that the expression of faith by a Buddhist is as profound and worthy of respect as our own. I believe a devout Mussulman when bowing to the East expresses his belief in a God as well as ourselves. When the muezzin calls to prayers from the lofty minarets of their country I believe their expression of confidence in a supreme being is as worthy of respect as mine.

I believe the orientals, fatalists as they are, yet have an abiding faith in an overruling power. Whether we be gentile or Jew, Catholic or Protestant, Christian, pagan, or Turk, whether we be of the crude belief of the North American Indian, bowing down before his primeval, barbaric altars, or whether we be an oriental, with his blind belief in his incarnated prophets on earth, whether it be the follower of Mohammed or the follower of Confucius, those who believe in Zoroaster, in the ancient seers and prophets of Israel or in the humane and more kindly doctrine taught by Christ after the star appeared upon His birth in the manger—all these beliefs, Mr. President, are intended to and do elevate and help mankind.

I believe, therefore, the criticism made of Bishop Newman's hymn, that it was not of a creed, that it was not sectarian in character, was improper. The fact that any person who believed in an overruling Providence might chant that hymn was enough to make it appear as one that was destined to do good around the world.

It has been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I will admit there is some truth in it, that this treaty contains some features that tend to make it seem sacrilegious to adopt such an amendment. My suggestion on that is, Mr. President, that even thugs, before they strangle their victims, invoke the blessing of their god; even thieves, before they steal, and the bloody warriors of an antique age before they went out to loot, to desolate, and to burn have invoked the blessings of their god.

I will admit that if this were adopted it would make any satire of Juvenal appear as a kindergarten effort. Nevertheless, I believe if this document is to pass into the history of diplomacy as a treaty binding some of the sovereign nations of the world, we can afford to read this into the preamble or introduction of the document.

I offer it in no sacrilegious or sarcastic sense. I offer it in good faith. I offer it because there is some that is good in the treaty and the league. I offer it hoping that some time the evil may disappear, that it may be purged of that evil, and that with time, and in the experience of nations, there will be a better league.

I remember reading, in the records of 1864, of a certain convention that met in Cleveland, Ohio. It was conducted largely by Carl Schurz and those who believed with him. They were all opposed to the administration of Abraham Lincoln, opposed to Gen. McClellan, the candidate opposing Lincoln, and to every other candidate except the one they favored. Mr. Schurz and his fellow thinkers adopted a platform at Cleveland. A great many otherwise good men were at that convention. One at last noticed that the platform adopted made no reference to the Deity. He offered an amendment to the platform invoking the assistance of Almighty God upon their efforts. Carl Schurz and his colleagues were very much opposed to it, and with a great show of indignation they voted it down. They did not wish any help from the Almighty or anybody else. They felt that they were amply sufficient for all purposes, both public and private.

The remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] made me think somewhat of the self-sufficiency of that historic band of men. Whatever we do with this document in the way of reservations does not injure us; it furnishes no pretext whatever, Mr. President, for any lengthy negotiations, if the assembly of delegates should reconvene to act upon it, and it does give it more standing. If it can be improved, I am in favor of improving it.

The treaty referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was a very striking illustration. All the epoch-making documents in the world's history of a vital, elemental kind, that create new conditions or seek to improve the conditions of the nations concerned, have not omitted some fleeting reference of the kind contained in this amendment.

When Lincoln penned his proclamation it was thought not unworthy to introduce some such reference. The Declaration of Independence refers to it where, "with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence," pledging their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, the fathers of the Republic concluded that document and subscribed their names.

If one reads back through English history, from whom we borrow and adapt much of our government and laws, the great elementary documents that make up the unwritten constitution of the British Empire, and especially the United Kingdom of Great Britain, those elemental documents when our English ancestors fought, with their lives in their hands, against the usurpation of tyrants that sometimes disgraced the English throne, from the first Charles, beheaded on the streets of London, to the abdicated, fleeing James II—in all those great historical documents or proceedings creating them there is a fitting reference to the Deity. In undertaking to frame a proper amendment I drew from the concluding words of the Emancipation Proclamation, composed and signed by Abraham Lincoln, these latter words, which are the exact language of this amendment, "invoking the considerate judgment of mankind."

What objection can be made to that? If there ever was a document presented to the Senate or ever a treaty proposed among sovereign nations that ought to provoke the considerate judgment of mankind, it is one that professes to be an evangel of peace and heralding the end of war.

We invoke, therefore, the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God—

Not the God of the Christian, not the God of the Jew, not the God of the followers of Zoroaster, the Buddhist, or the Brahmin, not the God of the oriental, not the God of Mohammed, but the God that supervises the affairs of men, of whatever color, race, or creed. We can afford to adopt such amendment, but you gentlemen in this body can not afford to defeat it. Defeat it and take the consequences, as you will of many another provision of this epochal document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. THOMAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon this amendment, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], in the list of documents in which reference is made to the Deity, did not include the Constitution of the United States, and quite properly, because it contains no reference to the Deity. The Senator has now been a Member of this body for something over five years, and if he has heretofore proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States correcting that document in that respect, my attention has not been called to it.

The fact is that when the people of his State, in the year 1818 under the authority of an act of Congress, undertook to frame their own organic law they omitted to make any acknowledgment of the interposition of the Deity in the affairs of man.

We must therefore look for some other purpose in the proposer of this amendment than a desire to perfect the document. With a very profound conviction that there is a just God who presides over the destiny of nations, I shall have no hesitancy at all in voting against the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, nobody can object, of course, to the first words of this proposed amendment invoking the considerate judgment of mankind, but I confess when it comes to invoking the blessing of Almighty God upon this treaty, which, however it may leave the Senate, will carry with it the infamy of Shantung, which, if there are not reservations or amendments put upon it of a drastic kind, will, in my opinion, shut the gates of mercy on a considerable portion of mankind, it seems to me, though I do not wish to reflect upon anyone else, that I at least can not do it. I can not bring myself to what would be in me hypocrisy. I do not ask, I am not ready to ask, the blessing of God on this instrument. I trust in His wisdom it may ultimately be turned to good purpose, but as it stands to-day I should personally think I were a hypocrite if I asked for the blessing of God upon it.

When Macbeth committed his great crime and the guards of the king turned in their sleep, and one of them said, "God bless us," Macbeth said:

> I could not say "Amen"
> When they did say "God bless us";
> * * * And "Amen"
> Stuck in my throat.

I think something does depend on the act we are about to do. I trust good may come out of this treaty. I hope it may. But in its present condition I should feel myself irreverent if I asked the blessing of Almighty God upon it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only desire to make one observation. It seems to me that the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] constitute the strongest argument for the adoption of the amendment, because the worse the treaty is the more it needs the supervision of the Almighty. It ought to be carried out or construed or re-formed in order to make it a proper document.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, to those Senators who can not vote for the amendment, because it would seem to be a sacrilege or blasphemy because of the iniquitous character of the document, I have no reply to make. There is no answer to one upon whose conscience it rests so heavily, and I respect even the vote of such Senators against the amendment upon that ground.

When the constitution of 1818 of my own State, and that of 1848 and that of 1870, was adopted, in each one of those constitutional conventions they opened with prayer. There was not a semblance of a clergyman, priest, rabbi, or any religious devotion of any character in the conference at Paris. There was not only an entire absence but it would have made the spirit of Voltaire rejoice if he could have seen the worldly self-sufficiency of that entire body of men. While there were creeds represented in the 23 nations known around the world, a general declaration referring to the Deity could not have aroused sectarian or racial controversy, and yet there was nothing of the kind attempted or even mentioned.

I have not understood that constitutional documents, since our Federal Constitution was created, leading the way, have referred to the Deity, but when this league of nations and treaty shall have been adopted we can afford to dispense with the Constitution, whether it is sacrilegious or otherwise, because we will have no use for it hereafter. Lord or no Lord, atheistical or Christian, when the league shall have been adopted and this treaty with its agnostic and materialistic provisions, we had as well cut loose from God Almighty and go our own atheistical, pagan way. That is where we are headed. That is what we will do.

A more Godless document and a more Godless body of men this world never saw than convened themselves in Paris. I shall not rebuke them; in this sense I have no right to, but I advert to the condition. I never prayed in my life. Born of Christian parents——

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator think it is about time he was beginning to pray?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; not upon the appearance of any such antagonist as the Senator from Arkansas. I can take care of him by myself, if God will just leave us alone. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupants of the galleries must maintain order and obey the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this problem or this wider question. I offered the amendment in a deeply reverential sense, with an idea that perhaps it might be adopted, that it could do no injury upon the final disposition of this document abroad, and that even against what appeals to me as the reason offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], even if I were inclined to take that view of it, it puts upon us, with the provisions as I see them, almost a blasphemous statement. But others think it a great document, full of virtue and destined to work incalculable good for mankind. I can not myself see how they can vote for it. They have hitherto been a majority upon all amendments. Therefore, with a majority favoring such a document, it seems to me that they ought to improve it by adding this amendment to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to add a word to the discussion. I have been a Member of this body for nearly seven years, and every morning of every session, except when we recessed from one day to the other, the blessing of Almighty God has been invoked upon the Senate from the lips of its Chaplain. If it has ever produced any material benefit up to this time, I have been unable to perceive it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope there will be no division of the Senate upon this question. However we may differ upon political questions, I do not believe Senators ought to be asked to go on record in opposition to this amendment. There are many Senators here who honestly and consistently have opposed amendments being added to this treaty. I am not one of this number. I have voted for amendments to try to remove certain unmistakable injustices which I believe the treaty contains, but I sympathize with the position of Senators who believe in this principle, the existence and guidance of nations by a Supreme Being, and who, if we were ourselves originally framing this covenant, would favor the incorporation of this amendment. I do not believe such Senators should be forced to go on record on this religious question by voting for or against this amendment, when their policy is that of continuous opposition to all amendments. Therefore I hope that the Senate will not proceed so far with this question as to create a division and oblige Senators in the future to make explanations which may be difficult to make, because in years hence one can not explain all the motives and circumstances surrounding this issue. One can not always explain the motive which actuates or prompts amendments of this kind, and one can not always explain, without misunderstanding, his reasons for voting against amendments which ordinarily would be unanimously adopted. The Senate of the United States ought not to be obliged to go on record in opposition to the clear Christian principle which is expressed in this amendment and which we all believe in, and yet that will be the fact if this matter is pressed, because of the well-known opposition of many Senators to all amendments, on the theory that this treaty should not be changed so as to require its resubmission to the peace conference.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] be laid on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement made on previous roll calls, I desire to state that I am paired with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and therefore must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on previous roll calls regarding my pair, I desire to say that if permitted to vote I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I am authorized to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is absent on official business. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with his colleague, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are paired on this vote. If present and at liberty to vote, the Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea" and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—57.

So Mr. SHERMAN's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. HALE subsequently said,

Mr. President, I find that there is a slight misunderstanding on the part of some of my colleagues in regard to my vote on the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I was not in the Chamber when the motion to lay on the table was made, and when I came in and voted I supposed that I was voting on the amendment itself. I voted "nay." I did not change my vote, because I was entirely willing to have the motion to lay on the table defeated and then to vote on the amendment itself. In that case I should, of course, have voted "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which was presented by me on October 27, and which has been printed, with which, I presume, the Members of the Senate are more or less familiar; but, in order that its provisions may be understood, I desire very briefly to state wherein it differs from the amendment presented by the committee upon which we voted the other day.

The amendment upon which we have already voted was an amendment whereby the United States was given six votes in equality with the six votes of the British Empire. I am not, of course, stating verbatim the amendment, but I am now stating its design and what was sought to be accomplished by it. The committee amendment upon which the Senate has passed proposed to give six votes to the United States in equality with the voting power of Great Britain. There were various objections to that amendment. Some of them were to the effect that it was not sufficiently drastic, that it did not go far enough, and that it did not accomplish fully its design. The amendment which is offered to-day goes very much further than the amendment which was presented by the committee, and in order that the amendment may be understood I want to read it and comment upon it for just a moment or two.

This amendment gives to the United States of America equal representation and equal voting power with the Empire of Great Britain in the assembly and in the council of the league of nations and as well gives the United States of America equal representation and equal voting power in the labor organization or labor conference under the league of nations. It goes yet a step further and precludes the voting of the colonies of Great Britain or Great Britain herself upon questions which affect those colonies or affect Great Britain. This amendment does everything that those who opposed the committee amendment desired that the committee amendment should do. It gives, I repeat, to the United States of America equal representation, equal voting power in the assembly and in the council of the league of nations, and equal representation in the labor conference and in the labor organization with the Empire of Great Britain.

There is just one question upon this amendment therefore: Does the Senate of the United States desire that the United States shall have equal votes and equal power and equal representation with the Empire of Great Britain, or does the Senate of the United States desire that Great Britain shall have six times the representation of the United States in the assembly, in the council, and in the labor conference? That is the issue; it is boiled down to that, and to that alone, by this amendment. That Senators may understand that fact I read the amendment to them:

When any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have representatives in the council or assembly, or any organization of labor or labor conference under the league, numerically equal to the aggregate number of representatives of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league, or organization of labor or labor conference under the league, and such representatives of the United States shall have the same powers and rights as the representatives of said member and its self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire; and upon all matters whatsoever the United States shall have votes in the council and assembly, and any organization of labor or labor conference under the league, numerically equal to the aggregate vote cast or registered by any such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire.

The intent and purpose of this amendment are to give to the United States representation upon council or assembly, and in any labor organization or labor conference under the league, a voting power in every respect and upon all questions equal to the aggregate representation and voting power of any member of the league and such member's self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire; and this amendment shall be liberally applied and construed to effectuate fully said intent.

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Mr. President, for just a moment now I wish to address myself to the arguments which have been made on this side of the Chamber against this sort of representation.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who made a very able argument the other day, insisted—

There ought not to be this inequality between the British Empire and the United States upon matters affecting the vital interests of the United States.

And in that, of course, we thoroughly agree.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], in stating his objections to the committee amendment, said:

I am in favor of some remedy for curing the inequality which the Johnson amendment seeks to cure, but I do not think the inequality can be cured by means of that amendment.

And then he stated, further, at the conclusion of his remarks:

I do not want to vote for the Johnson amendment * * *; further, because I believe that this inequality can be met by a reservation.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] was very, very plain in his remarks, and he asserted:

Most naturally and properly, the intent of the amendment under consideration has been generally approved. Were I not convinced that a reservation to be later offered would provide even greater protection, or if I believed the question could not be covered by a reservation, I would without hesitation vote for the pending amendment.

And, again, he said:

I am impressed with the view that our object is more practically accomplished by, in effect, reducing Great Britain's voting strength, rather than by increasing our own.

And yet again:

When voting against this amendment I want it to be clearly and emphatically understood that I propose to vote for reservations covering the same subject, and which, in my judgment, will protect America even to a greater extent than does this amendment.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], in presenting his remarks upon this subject, said:

I am not here to claim for Great Britain a preponderant vote in the assembly.

And again:

I believe that my country is entitled to the same representation as any other country in the world—

Mark the language, please:

I believe that my country is entitled to the same representation as any other country in the world, and I am willing that every other country should have the same representation as this country has. There is only one solution, and that is to provide that Great Britain, or the British Empire, shall have one vote, and only one vote.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in pursuing the subject, however, took something of a different position from that of his colleague; and he said, in answer to me, during a colloquy in which we were engaged:

The Senator has said that I am trying to reach the same result that he is, and to give this country the same number of votes in the assembly and council that Great Britain has. I have never tried to reach that result.

So we may take it that when the Senator from Maine favors a reservation he is not doing it upon the theory that there shall be either equal representation or equal voting power in the United States. All of these Senators who thus opposed the amendment the other day insist that they will reach the result—that is, equal representation and equal voting power—by means of a reservation; and here is the reservation suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, concurred in by the Senator from Minnesota, and, I presume, by other Senators as well:

That the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have had more than one vote; or in case of any dispute between the United States and any member in which such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically shall have voted.
